WORLD PEACE HAS ITS FOUNDATION IN WARM FEELINGS

If all of the people on earth would develop warm feelings in their emotions, this would create an enormous force for supporting world peace and would bring about a vast amount of international cooperation. Probably a global peace with strength would require most of the inhabitants to exhibit friendliness to each other as well as to refuse participation in wars or local violence. Simply improving the warmth of peoples emotions would produce a wonderful movement from their violence. But, possibly the elimination of world violence would require strategic thoughts and actions by all of friendly people after they develop their warm feelings. Eventually the inhabitants of the world would welcome the security and tranquility that accompanies real peace.

Warm Feelings Create A Powerful Peaceful Force For Peace

Human emotions are endowed with the special peaceful force of love that produces various amounts of warm feelings, including affection, friendliness, appreciation, honesty, fearlessness and other valuable sensibilities. As the warmth of these individual or group feelings grow warmer the strength of the enriching force increases. Actually, any improving warm feelings stimulates more love in the individual or group that develops the the warmer feelings and also more love in the other individual or group that welcomes the warmer emotion. But, if the warmth of any human feelings decreases, appropriate energizing emotions are necessary to rebuild the improving trend of the enriching force. A valuable means for starting the acceleration of a dwindling love is to provide an opportunity for the individual or group to make an important successful effort to help solve a serious human problem. Any outstanding success in helping troubled people in a friendly way can stimulate and expand the development of warm feelings in a victorious helper.

The essential warmth of feelings has variable enriching power that makes loving people search for more warmth, on a curve of emotional warmth plotted against the strength of efforts. When the emotion of an individual or group acquires a small amount of compassion the warmth of feelings makes a sudden appearance that increases immediately to significant strength. Then, as love gets still more powerful, warmth increases in a more gradual pattern that gives evidence of growth. Such evidence of how powerful a peaceful force warm feelings can become suggests that people should keep searching for and practicing with still warmer feelings. There are many friendly thoughts and actions that can contribute to this continued expansion of love. So, warm feelings is not a static emotion that people have or do not have. Human warm feelings have wonderful possibilities for producing world peace in the future.

Examinations show that warm feelings ~~suffer not only~~ from minor dwindling of its wonderful force, but also from real gaps in its presence. When highly unsatisfactory conditions arise in the lives of some individuals or groups, love can disappear and the negative gap could be filled with hatred or bitter dissatisfactions that might be the result of serious individual or group problems. The valuable competence of warm feelings is that they can overcome the negative gaps, which result from serious painful problems. This revival of friendliness require strong renewal of interest in its warm feelings and an aggressive practice of loving people who are responsible for stimulating the bitter feelings that stopped the original love. Forgiveness is an important warm force for eliminating resentments and getting love started-up again. On most occasions people with very warm feelings can largely ignore any bitter treatment that they receive.

The enriching force of love has been discovered as an important emotional power that encourages many human beings to have feelings and actions, which make warm friendly cooperation better and more rewarding. Love is frequently associated with religions that develop deep friendliness in their members. Also, in a warm society love is closely related to affectionate sex. But, warm friendly emotions are detected in a wide variety of important human relationships and human decisions about what should be done to solve problems warmly and legally. If an individual develops hatred, violence, fear, bitterness, dishonesty, superiority, pain, disasters, harmfulness, injuries or stupidity their primary emotion has a name that might even be called cruelty or savagery. Whereas peaceful love that is followed carefully is the emotion that supplies much kindness, tenderness, helpfulness and improving action along with the persons warm friendly inner feelings. So, peaceful people should adopt the most benevolent emotions that supply the most powerful love with the warmest feelings in many natural human functions.

A remarkably peaceful feature of warm feelings is that warm thoughts, words and actions send very friendly messages. These love messages reach not only the people who are contacted and helped, but also (as a backward movement) the lovers who developed the warm thoughts and actions. The result is that love becomes a very important emotional self interest of affectionate people and groups who send out warm messages that develop concerns for more love. Naturally loving messages can be in the form of warm words (spoken or written) good signals, helpful actions, monetary contributions or cooperative influences. In particular, these friendly communications create special two way peaceful exhilaration when people sending these messages are responsible for the wonderful saving of human lives or for the helping of others in serious trouble. Even so, the warmest of actions may produce sorrowful weeping of the concerned lover, when the receiver of the love message does not recover from the serious trouble.

The warm feelings of human beings are quite valuable for peace because they are far reaching and they have complicated patterns. Physical, mental, emotional and monetary aspects of human lives are usually regarded as separate entities. But, important studies of forces that are involved in these parts of life reveal that there is considerable emotional influence in all parts of individual and group experiences. The many sections of human abilities have considerable reciprocity that would benefit from the extensive adoption of a warm enriching force inside of individuals and between two or more persons. As love invigorates the emotional, mental and physical health of people, the spread of this peaceful emotional feeling over all of mankind is a highly important world goal. Hopefully, the uniting force of group warm feelings will expand around the world from the pressure of increasing love in many warm human beings.

Good communications are important for world peace and warm feelings do a wonderful job of helping people who are working for world peace by expanding the meaning of the questionable terms such as self interest, which has been widely used to express selfishness and an exaggerated feeling of one persons prosperity without regard to others. The term self interest has been employed so much for expressing selfishness that it will be discarded in this discussion of world peace because warm feelings are closely related to world wide friendly personal self fulfillment, which is a really important self interest of highly concerned and cooperative people. So, The discussions of the problems of world peace will concentrate on expressions of general opinions about problem solving actions that would benefit the vast majority of the people on earth. Efforts will be made to consider the human rights terms of civil liberties and freedoms in the foreground of the discussions of most actions on world problems. But, special emphasis will be kept on the emotion of warm feelings as the driving force that is needed for the solutions worlds many problems. This driving force is expected to make more people assume some responsibility for helping to make important progress toward world peace.

Nations Have Indications That World Peace Needs Warm Feelings

Progress toward a peaceful world ~~would be more feasible~~ when practically all people recognize the warm feeling necessities that must be embraced by earths population as a whole. One indication that real peace would be working its way around the world would be for nations to become quite united in their relationships and for political factions in all nations to become warmly peaceful in their world actions. Then, in the economic realm the important peaceful feature would be no preparation for wars, except possibly for an international police force. Negotiations would be used to settle most disputes around the world. So, more friendly feelings and actions in international relationships would be desirable for world peace.

Evidence that world peace needs warm feelings to spread throughout the world is indicated by friendly nations working together on serious international problems, involving economics. Communication between warmly associated countries has become fairly free, so the people in these friendly nations learn important information about the industries in other friendly countries and how dependent nations are on each other. To an increasing degree international trade has become free and this commerce has become increasingly extensive to satisfy the economic requirements of friendly countries. The indications are that in a peaceful world nations would be able to work together in the economic realm after recognizing their interdependence. Each country would need to enter the world market with special producer goods, special ability to provide services or special manufacturing abilities.

A significant indication that peace is begining to reach out over the world with warm feelings is given by the personal freedom for learning in multi-party democracies. Such possibility for world peace is revealed by the production of some good educational systems for children while growing up in the warmer modern educational schools. With its responsibilities freedom with warm feelings seems to be valuable for stabilizing peace when people understand other people around the world. Hopefully, in more democracies the educational systems will try to teach more people to understand other people, so their warm feelings of freedom become more realistic. When people assume all of the responsibilities of warm feelings in freedom, they become friendly enough with worlds inhabitants to demand world peace. Fortunately, when warmly concerned people live in democracies that have freedom for their feelings, their demands can have peaceful effects.

Worlds peaceful local areas have discovered that warm feelings would decrease their personal accidental violence. A possible solution to some of these personal problems has been the training of people in carefulness and in frequent checking the safety of all mechanical, electrical and chemical devices. Substantial reduction in the use of alcohol, drugs and tobacco have improved the safety of road travel as drivers of cars and busses have fewer accidents. Also, simple obedience of transportation rules in city streets has improved citizens contribution to local peace. Then, as transportation moves strongly into the airplane area, the inspection of these vehicles has become fairly careful at every station and for every trip. World travel has become relatively safe as world peace reaches down into peoples daily lives with warm feelings.

Important progress toward world peace would emerge if more local areas in all nations would develop warm feelings, so their groups would stop being violent. Advancement toward world peace would be given important assistance by friendly meetings and helpful activities that take place locally. Much more charity and much less corruption in a region usually stimulates their friendly people to get along very peacefully. Helping the elderly, handicapped and people that need help is a wonderful path toward peace. Eliminating unemployment, particularly among the youth and handicapped, would contribute to the local spirit of friendliness. In a warm peaceful society there would be much fewer gangs and the gangs would be much more cooperative. Here, the local disorders would be relieved by identifying the problems and having the friendly people that are involved reach peaceful agreements. With this skill, peaceful action might spread from local areas to their nations, when the nations suffer similar disorders.

Any search for means to develop world peace must explore all human beings to identify their tenderest emotions. Warm feelings of people must become quite extensive in all countries, when world peace becomes realistic. The careful investigation would discover that human compassion provides the powerful force that is needed to generate the important amount of peaceful action, even where reasonable harmony exists. People with warm feelings assume considerable responsibility for helping every person in trouble and for making the world a more friendly united human structure. With the powerful force in action, world peace would create an enormous amount of cooperation that accompanies its warm feelings

World Peace Begins With Warm Feelings In The Homes

Love has been recognized for a long time as a valuable force for getting peaceful homes started. In the marriage ceremony female and male, soon to become mother and father, express their warm feelings quite openly. The initial family structure of parents, who create children, is usually strongly based on a measure of love. But, the strength in the warm feelings of this love needs to be increased in all prospective parents in order to insure a peaceful home relationship. This increase in the warmth of parental feelings requires a learning process that is participated in by both female and male. Fortunately, adequate improving love in the home usually keeps a friendly marriage intact.

As initial husband and wife feelings get warmer their friendly communications expand in many ways to make the home peaceful. In particular, couples that are warming their feelings send messages of love to each other by more friendly talking. With friendly conversations husband and wife can get better acquainted with each other and can limit arguing in their talks about problems by exercising peaceful compromises. Also, the interchange of family services of a married couple improves with the warmth of feelings, so each person learns what the other is able to do well. Further, warmer feelings encourages a married couple to accomplish more important work together and indulge in more entertainment together. Peaceful family unity is improved by many concessions that are made with deeper warm feelings.

Warm feelings make planning more enjoyable for any progress in peaceful home development. Preparation for the future in homes is benefitted considerably when the two starting members have an interchange of uniting emotions that are quite warm. Stronger peaceful emotions in a family couple improves any organized action projects together. The different sections of family projects are divided up, so each member of the couple is assigned the action that fits his or her capability. When their love is strong, peaceful planning for the future takes advantage of the talent of each family member. Warmness of the relationship improves the strategy of the divided action, which frequently needs revision to handle changes that occur in the changing family situations.

When children arrive in a peaceful family, the increased parental responsibility and expanded warm feelings make the new arrivals important members of the family unit. The reliability of the love process develops strong relationships between all members of the enlarged family group. Each new arrival adds to the complexity of the group emotions, because each baby calls for special warm treatment as it grows up. In a peaceful home parental warm feelings do not show any discrimination toward their children during the important growing up period. In loving families differences in children in all respects are accepted, so each one is recognized as an important individual in society. Because their homes are very warm places, parents can teach their children the power of love and can be successful in getting them dedicated to practicing warm feelings on a large scale.

Loving homes become especially effective in providing peaceful instruction for all of the emotional, mental and physical aspects of childrens lives. With their warm feeling obligations parents would continue to show love to all of their children after birth in a powerful way. They would make warm physical contacts with all babies and would direct their emotional activities with friendliness and tenderness. As the children grow older they would be instructed in the power of love, so they would be able to get along with others in a very friendly way. Also, the loving parents would make special efforts to develop improving mental abilities in their children. New ideas would be presented to these growing members of the family, so they would be able to increase their thinking skills. Children would become stimulated to understand the need for more warm feelings in the world today. Then, the loving homes would give recognition to their children for looking after their physical well being by adopting a good nutrition. and by being careful enough to avoid accidents. Some instruction in physical skills would attempt to improve the actions of arms, hands, legs, and feet of each child. Children have many human rights in loving homes to receive the best of peaceful training and to express their warm feelings with smiles and laughter.

In the modern day parental warm feelings have a serious problem in many homes. Quite a large number of homes are so indigent that both mother and father need to be employed in full time jobs to bring in enough money for good financial support. Also, some other homes become single parent organizations after a divorce. So in both conditions, the mother, who has had to provide the major portion of the warm feelings in the home, now has her part of the dual responsibility of training children and earning the necessary money to pay the home bills. This home situation has led to the development of friendly preschool training groups that assume some of the responsibility for giving the children who are partially abandoned in the home the warm feelings that they need to help them develop their own feelings. Such warm training groups for very young children provide some of the requirements for their achieving satisfactory emotions. But, working parents must enter into the love training program as much as possible.

In loving homes Mothers and Fathers have great opportunities to work for world peace by raising peaceful children. When mothers of these homes are obligated to work during the day, they maintain their maximum contacts with their children who would be in preschool training groups the mothers working period. They take over children supervision before they go to work, after they come home from work and on Saturdays and Sundays, when they are off work. Evidence indicates that warm feelings between a mother and a very young child are valuable contributions to the child's emotions and growth. Fathers in loving homes have their off work chance to help their children develop warm feelings. When they are at home they give children considerable warm attention. Fathers even help mothers plan activities for children that makes the warm home more loving. Evidence indicates the value of loving parents, even when their contacts with their children are decreased to a degree. The importance of parents in providing children with loving care is being recognized by governments and industries, so parents can keep most of their jobs while they are giving children essential warm feelings care.

Unfortunately for the achievement of world peace a high percent of world homes have not developed the warmth of feelings that would make them peacefully beautiful. High up on the list of serious problems that face the world today is the need to create many more homes having an upper level of warm feelings. The severity of the problem is different in different countries and the distressing conditions are diverse in areas of population density differences. Still, an astonishing number of human difficulties would receive some relief, if a very high percent of world homes became quite beautiful with warm emotions. This special world need calls for much more instruction in the value of improved emotions in every segment of every society.

World Peace Activists Have To Struggle With Warm Feeling Variations

The elemental inherited and early developed feelings of many of earth's individuals are variable emotions that are needed for world peace. Here the classification of people that receive slightly lower ratings in warm feelings than their opposites have members who are remarkable loving. Also, the categories of people who are given higher emotional ratings than their opposites still need to develop more members with the high level of warm feelings that are important for world peace. The competence for loving other people quite warmly seems to be dependent to a certain degree on individuals sex, race and religion. The total warmth of their peaceful love is determined by the individuals determination to minimize their discrimination in warm feelings and their resolution not to react negatively when they receive poor feelings or undesirable treatment.

This judgement of the relative warm feeling competence of human females and males is based on close observations of young human beings who were not on drugs or other modifying habits. But, if bad habits are introduced into the considerations, the relative warmth of the two genders would be widened more. With strict considerations, indications suggest that the earliest home environments tends to make the average young females more loving than the average young males. Apparently, while they are growing up, girls usually experience more loving conditions that give them somewhat warmer feelings than boys on the average. Then, normally school girls are not as aggressive as boys in the class rooms and on the play grounds. Also, average emotional differences seem to continue with increasing age.

The slight advantage that average adult women have over average adult men in developing warm feelings shows up in various ways. Women indulge in much less violence than men, even when they take part in large scale protests of unsatisfactory situations. Gangs that wreck some city communities and fire bullets from passing cars are nearly all male. Many progressive social services are supported more by women than by men and their peaceful organizations are frequently given women leadership. Women are more involved in actively producing and peacefully protecting the human species, so they live longer than men and fill up the retirement homes. Some organizations for the elderly are somewhat crowded with women, because they are more available than men.

With the apparent evidence that, on the average, women have somewhat warmer feelings than men and indulge in less corruption, peaceful democracies might attempt to elect nearly as many women as men in government offices. In this direction, several world women in public service management have done good jobs. So, if the world had a larger number of democracies under the leadership of women, international cooperation might increase and expanding world peace might be possible. As the need for better world peace is substantial this change in democratic leadership is worth an experiment.

World peace is confronted with a variety of human races that remain separated as groups by their emotions. Inside of each racial group warm feelings of the members are distributed somewhat normally, except when tribes or religions cause distinctions. But, emotional prejudice of most racial groups against the other groups is a force that keeps races substantially separated. Most human races even exert emotional pressure on their members against their combining with other races by the marriage process. Still the development of considerable warm feelings of one race for all of the others would be an exceptionally valuable force for world peace. Then, if all nations would adopt a world language these warm feelings could be communicated effectively on an international basis.

Warm Feelings Exist In The most Loving Religions

Compassionate religions engage in many practices of creating love among members. These religious organizations need considerable credit for their effective warm developing processes. In particular they have training classes for people of all ages that specialize in teaching love. Regular organizational meetings are designed to build up warmer feelings. Music is well planned to train members in the art of producing warm emotions with harmonious sounds. Some groups of members are usually quite active in working on social problems. World wide efforts are made to spread the warmth of human feelings by sending missionaries to various countries. Many religions play an important part in spreading love.

World emotional feelings have already been made somewhat warmer in areas with the compassionate action of religions. Still, the need for more love is so great that these devotional organizations should become more widely influential for warming feelings. Competition between various religions over different beliefs has led to religious wars. So, the concentration of instruction for members should be on love, even for all people of other faiths. The relationships between different faiths should become more cooperative in spirit. Working closer together should make the love of religions more effective in creating the world as a peaceful place for human habitation.

World Peace Depends On Individual Internal And External Warm Feelings

Personal human emotions have occasional minor sensations that need to be replaced so individuals have a peaceful and satisfying existence. Most of these unsatisfactory feelings are inner emotions that create considerable stress like anger, bitterness, fear and selfishness. Most of the individuals can expect to experience a strong anger, when they encounter a tough unpleasantness and on occasion this sensation lasts too long. But, adequate warm feelings can reduce this cold feeling by a warm acceptance procedure, so it lasts only a short time. Also, bitterness may develop in some people under conditions that are spiteful, so a change is needed here and the stinging effect of unpleasant situations should be made acceptable with warm feelings. Fear is a natural reaction to a frightening experience. Still, the courage that accompanies warm feelings can subdue this weakening emotion with the strength of inner peace. Even selfishness can occupy too large a proportion of human emotions, while warm feelings can focus individual self interest on improving individual ability to give peaceful service to society. Inner human emotions need considerable emotional improvement for world peace.

Additional inner emotions that afflict some individuals with a lack of concern about human difficulties require improvement to produce world peace. Among these unfortunate feelings are weakness in problem concerns, little caring about social improvements, little involvement in helping needy people and inaccurate judgement of what is needed to solve human problems. Without deep concerns about social problems, people may require considerable increase in warm feelings to attain the desire to help those in want. When there is little caring about making human life on earth more peaceful, more people with warm feelings are essential around the world. In case many people do not participate in some remedial work for society because of their emotions, more warm feelings may start improving their friendly actions. When people have defective judgements about what social services to help and how to help them successfully, these poor opinions require warm feelings to transfer the helping people to the most important services that have the most effective remedies.

The peaceful value of warm feelings becomes most apparent as it promotes friendly relationships between individuals who are in regular contact. Of course love serves as a foundation for the peaceful homes. But, friendly emotions are highly essential in many human contacts. So, warm feelings are responsible for the action of people helping people in a friendly way. When two or more people reach out peacefully to support each other in need of help, warm feelings can be trusted to create more closeness. The emotional reward can reach a maximum as an individual saves the life of another person. With this wonderful action, love can get exceptionally warm and deep in human emotions.

Unfortunately some human emotions develop undesirable sensations in certain people that are offensive enough to create considerable antagonism. When these feelings are highly offensive, such as hatred, violence, cruelty and dishonesty, the demand for warm feelings should become enormous, because such bad emotions need to be overcome. When a measure of international friendliness is desirable, the world has too many people who detest others for various reasons. Apparently the only way that hatred can be overcome is to develop and expand the warm feelings in the haters until their hard emotions are softened. Sensations that have led to violence have developed some of the devastating effects of offensive emotions. Other feelings that promote cruelty and dishonesty also demand enrichment of human emotions to make society a safer place. All efforts to eliminate such unsatisfactory sensations need more strength in peoples warm feelings.

Numerous outgoing human emotions require improvement even though they are not very aggressive. These less violent but undesirable human feelings include lack of harmony, unacceptable disagreements, little mercy and no forgiveness. But, the peaceful strength of warm feelings can overcome the inertness of these attitudes that are damaging to human relationships. A measure of love opposes discords with friendliness and brings about considerable harmony. When the feelings of arguing people are warm enough disagreements are accepted. If loving individuals receive minor acts of aggression, they are forgiving and merciful. Warm feelings display their effective peaceful force on a continuing basis.

World Peace Responds To Warm Internal And External Mental Activities

Numerous individuals are obsessed with personal mental problems that do not give them very much desire for making peaceful improvements. But, while some human mental problems are superstitions or physical mind disorders that require special relief, discording mental hardships of people primarily involve the need for warm feelings that stimulate the mind peacefully. These mental difficulties include ignorance, poor understanding, and inadequate thinking about possible effective improvements, which are largely individual responsibility. One of the beauties of warm feelings is their stimulating concerned people to obtain quite accurate information about human situations. Loving individuals want to learn more about what exists in the world and what is happening around them. Also, their warm feelings exert pressure to comprehend the cause of the present conditions and what might make the circumstances improve. Concerned people are thinking about their regular schedules most of the time and warm feelings introduce important social considerations into these thoughts. Social progress is highly dependent on the constructive thinking of concerned individuals.

Common mental problems of concerned individuals are benefitted by the warm feelings that help them make peaceful decisions, while their minds are churning. Among the common individual topics for thinking is the choice of what the mind would be concentrated on during the work of making a good living. Performing business jobs intelligently demands an important segment of personal mental thinking that needs joint warm feelings. Also, external activities that provide mental satisfactions, such as music performance and dramatic entertainment, develop mental thinking that is benefitted by warm feelings. Personal thinking can play a valuable role in spreading peaceful human compassion.

Individual mental processes are assisted considerably by memory of the peaceful things that have taken place in the past. It is difficult for people to keep the non peaceful occurrences in mind and this memory trouble increases as individuals get older. Routine occurrences are usually forgotten rather easily and names of things and people are not retained in the mind as long as thinking people would desire. Still, by good fortune the very pleasant occurrences that take place with very warm feelings are kept in a persons memory quite well and become stimulants for world peace. The feelings that accompany the saving an individuals life or the making a substantial contribution to societies peace can keep the events in mind until death. Even the memory of names belonging to very loving people who have been quite peaceful lasts very well.

Mental illnesses are common debilitating diseases that lead to violence in certain areas of mankind and they receive research by concerned psychiatrists. As a result of some tests, apparently the principal treatments that are recommended for mental disorders are various medications. The objective of these remedies may specialize in making brains work better in tests and uncontrolled delusions may originate in distressed brains that respond favorably to effective chemicals. But, many mental illnesses may call for a great deal of progressive warm feelings from helpful people with wonderful emotions. The simple realization of the existence of this mental disorder may be helped considerably by receiving a measure of warm feelings. Then, the determination of an afflicted to eliminate the trouble may require an increase in friendliness for society. Even brain skans may not become as useful for a sufferer as exposure to loving situations that would overcome the brain disease.

World peace encounters group mental problems that call for warm feelings. Social issues that concern a group with a common interest expand the progressive thinking operations by those with warm feelings. Every problem that is approached by concerned groups requires the collection of accurate information and the development of a measure of understanding the difficulty. Then, warm feelings start the planning of a peaceful operation that might result in an improvement of the situation. A mentally designed advancement of a peaceful remedial process is a valuable consideration before experimental action is started on the problem. Evidence exists that planning with warm feelings offers an important chance for concerned people in a group to make social advancement peacefully.

The great concerns of well informed peaceful individuals focus on the need to improve the world education system. This training organization is obsessed with many problems that decrease its effectiveness in preparing all students to help build friendly societies, stable economies, and good democracies. Well conceived peaceful experiments seem to be essential to make the educational systems more effective, for teaching peace, to make the class smaller, to drastically decrease the number of drop outs and to improve the thinking character of the graduates. Improving the minds of growing up children may require much more warm feelings from adults in an educational environment at school as well as at home. The subject matter of each educational course should have its peaceful significance while the warm feelings of all classes should make schools very valuable parts of peaceful societies.

World Peace Needs Warm Feelings For Personal Physical Problems

Mishaps that diminish world peace are fairly common for poorly caring individuals in homes, yards and swimming pools. In many cases the physical problems of the very poor are due to starvation. But, in some instances the difficulties are the result of sufferers not keeping in good physical condition with satisfactory diets prescribed by warm feelings. Good physical condition is usually the result of individuals eating all of the necessary food materials and avoiding the undesirable dainties and allergic edibles. Demands of each individual may be different, so those with warm feelings should run experiments on themselves to separate desirable nutriment from the undesirable foods. For real friendliness these experiments should determine, at the request of warm emotions, the right amount of food that should be eaten and the desirable vitamin supplements that should be added. Good peaceful diets may be dependent on the tests that are run under the emotional concerns of the consuming individuals.

Each non peaceful year a large number of individuals are injured in accidents that some one might have helped prevent, if they were more caring about peoples safety. Unfortunately airplane accidents require an enormous amount of warm feelings. Fortunately car drivers who have warm feelings strictly obey all of the rules of driving on streets and highways. Also, these caring people keep their cars in good condition so their driving is safer. In addition, drivers with warm feelings make special efforts to avoid collisions with others they encounter who fail to observe all traffic rules. Traffic on streets and highways is destined to increase to the point where warm feelings will become an extraordinarily desirable emotion in peaceful car and truck drivers.

Individuals with the warm feelings that are necessary for world peace learn that they need adequate exercise to keep in good physical condition, so they can embrace and shake hands with others. All parts of the human body and appendages should participate in the motion that adds more circulation to the inner fluids and strengthens muscles. For some time rapid walking and careful running have been known to be valuable kinds of exercise. Dancing and sports have added considerably to the overall human motion that has kept people in good physical condition. Still, individual physical problems that require special exercises are wide spread, because different individuals may require different exercises. This situation gives people with warm feelings the motive to make experimental motions to determine the moving performances that give them desirable peaceful benefits. Even though exercise classes may be available, individuals can do hand, arm and leg stretching motions daily in the home and can jump up and down on a trampoline. Human beings need inner stimulated circulation to keep them peaceful.

Various human diseases that have fatal results require special prevention activities of peaceful individuals with warm feelings. These people who are quite concerned about the severity of fatal diseases get more causal and preventive information and then spread the possibilities of prevention. This effort has made vaccination fairly successful in controlling many dangerous ailments. Also, warm feeling individuals have promoted the extensive world study of cancers, so these quite fatal diseases can sometimes be controlled. Prevention methods to combat cancers can always be given more experiments in peaceful societies. Now, people have a new fatal disease called Aids that is spreading around the world by methods that are still under close investigation in peaceful societies. When preventive and curing methods are discovered for Aids, these methods will require wide distribution by caring concerned individuals. Any other new serious disease will requite this action for peace. Eventually, with the force of people with warm feelings, world societies may provide adequate health care for the poor and elderly.

Individual physical problems that threaten world peace have been increased by the acceleration in the use of habit producing drugs. The difficulties show up rather strongly in the unfortunate behavior of addicts and also in their lack of attention to judgement and responsibility. Usually those habit forming chemicals make personality changes in the addicts. The increased addiction of individuals to drugs, like cocaine, has enlarged other social difficulties like crime, gang violent action and family instability. The hazzards of people developing these habits are well enough apprehended that government action is engaged in trying to prevent the sale of these chemicals. This problem of stopping the supply of drugs is so complicated that peaceful people with warm feelings must exert more efforts to eliminate the demand of present addicts for these drugs.

Drinking alcoholic beverages has expanded world peace troubles for centuries. When an individual becomes drunk physical action is not manipulated well and judgement becomes a lot poorer. Then, unfortunately a substantial number of alcohol drinkers become alcoholics. Still, some drinking has been accepted over the years with its troubles, inspite of attempts for prohibition. Liquers are available at many grocery stores and alcoholic beverages are available at many parties. Frequently peaceful people are pressured into drinking. So, the expansion of driving cars and trucks on highways and streets has made the alcohol drinking problem quite serious. An astonishing number of people are killed yearly by drunk drivers who create motor accidents. Individuals with warm feelings must step into the violence preventing process by promoting greatly reduced drinking.

After quite a period of time the smoking of tobacco has been recognized as an anti peace process that needs more control. The smoke that is produced by burning tobacco has been identified as having chemicals and particles with special toxic ~~properties~~ that decrease the length of the breathers life. Many smokers have apparently had their lives reduced in length by nearly twenty percent. Then, associates of smokers, who are non smokers but do second class breathing of their smoke, have had their lives cut short. This anti peace effect on non smokers who breath dangerous materials produced by others has finally resulted in laws that make smoking in many public facilities illegal. Also, most public eating places have non smoking areas. Still, adequate peaceful control efforts require considerable action by concerned warm feeling non smokers.

The failure of cooperation among individuals who suffer from various emotional difficulties becomes more dangerous as the means for expressing poor emotions becomes more deadly. Development of inferior warm feelings may still become effective enough to overcome minor hostilities. But, a high percent of individuals with bad habits do not acquire enough emotional warmth to make their lives very peaceful. Thus, the gun has made one means for expressing enmity so convenient for the uncontrolled that their bad feelings frequently become fatal when they shoot the person receiving their strong repulsion. This violence problem calls strongly for an expansion of warm feelings in individuals by effective education, because possessing of guns and other weapons is quite legal in many countries that want their citizens to protect themselves from attacks and also because a high number of people are drug addicts with little control of their ~~poor~~ emotions. Thus the adequate instruction of children in the process of friendly cooperation becomes a serious difficulty.

This need for effective anti crime education suggests that every elementary school around the world should provide their students with instruction in warm feelings and law obedience. Such instruction might be concentrated in elementary schools, so the training might give the children a good start on being law obeying citizens. Probabably the law obeying school teaching sessions should not interfere with the standard class instruction activities, So, the anti-crime education might be an activity after the regular class dismissal time. The subject matter presented and the warm feelings expressed should be so convincing to children that special instructor should be provided who would have persuasive abilities.

The peace promoting education would need to be quite strategic in order to be effective in getting the students to respond with better warm feelings. If the long road to peace reaches its goal, the extra special instruction of children would need to emphasize the wonderful human values that might be obtained with warm feelings. Even though some of the ones receiving the special peace education might be poor or disadvantaged, students need to be trained in the value of human rights. With this necessity, probably the teachers of the special anti-crime courses should be police men or police women who enjoy their contacts with all children and would express their friendliness during their peaceful instruction. Then, personal procedures would be essential to test the students for the extent of their achieving warm feelings during the series of class sessions and rewards would be given to all of the achievers. Also, opportunities would be given to the relatively poor performers to demonstrate their improved warm feelings and when the improvements were real, the special advancing students would be given rewards. Children need to learn that a peaceful society wants all friendly inhabitants to survive as long as their habits and surroundings permit.

World Peace Requires Help For Earthwide Physical Problems

An astonishing number of physical disasters face earth's population and call for special expansion of warm feelings in world peace people. Unfortunately some of these serious difficulties are beyond the preventive control of the afflicted. Thus these natural occurrences require rapid remedial action by highly concerned and friendly people. One type of serious disaster that has a variety of devastating effects is the earthquake, which shakes areas of the earth that have moving cracks in the crust surface. Many earthquakes do a great deal of property damage. So, a tremendous amount of help from world peace is needed to make repairs for the people who suffer the earthquake damage. When friendly people with warm feelings give effective repair assistance, the community gets special physical rewards and emotional refinement.

Other natural physical disasters, which require help from world peace, develop in areas of earth that are subject to tropical cyclones. In these areas, hurricanes or tornadoes create violent thundersstorms, which do a great deal of damage to most buildings that are struck by the wind. As little can be done as present to prevent these natural destructions, relief work in the form of repairs and reconstructions are necessary by friendly governments and people with warm feelings. In addition, considerable research work in predicting the formation of cyclones is desirable in world peace to keep threatened people aware of their serious danger and to develop possible preventives.

Earth's environment is being gradually subjected to special difficulties that are largely being created by the inhabitants. Much more information is desirable for peaceful people and governments to cooperate in preventing air pollution disasters. One problem is developing by the process of discharging chemicals in the air that attack the upper ozone layer, which is essential to block harmful ultraviolet radiation on earth. Concerned people must decrease the ultraviolet radiation that is harmful to their bodies by keeping the ozone layer intact. Then, earth's population discharges gases in the atmosphere that may create an undesirable heat blanket around earth. With the help of concerned people carbon dioxide from the present popular combustion energy process may need to be consumed by an increasing amount of plant life on earth. Also, other chemicals that form smog in the air must be removed largely according to a government clean air bill, but definitely by partnership of government, industry and warm feeling individuals.

Serious physical problems are afflicting people around the world to the extent that global attention is getting to those with warm feelings. Among these difficulties that are well recognized are hunger, homelessness, poor child care, elderly neglect and lack of general health insurance. Search for countries where these problems are being worked on results in considerable immigration around the world. People with warm feelings who have become concerned with these physical problems are struggling to help the United Nations to make progress in solving these important world wide physical afflictions. The world can be made into a more pleasant place for human beings to live by their loving action of helping needy people peacefully.

The world physical problems reach a peak in their demand for warm feelings to suppress massive violent engagements in which thousands of people are killed. One outstanding requirement for world peace is the strengthening of warm feelings in most individuals of all nations, so many more of these friendly people will refuse to engage in war activities. The violence in all wars results in the death of a large number of citizens and a larger number of combatants who engage in the conflicts. As a result, the relatives of the extensive war dead suffer an enormous amount of sorrow and economic difficulties. Also, even though the number of combatants that are killed in wars has been estimated as varying with the number engaged in the conflicts and the length of the violence, the number of civilians that lose their lives seems to be increasing considerably with the advanced technology of the deadly weapons. These departures from world peace are very confusing, as the causes of most hostilities are difficult to determine and the objectives of each side are usually simply to win the victory. Occasionally, the winner may serve as a world police force, so it might reach a desirable success that produces an improved human relationship. However, the damage that is caused by human lives that are slaughtered and valuable property that is destroyed has become so great that world peace must demand an enormous increase in warm feelings to prevent violent conflicts and substitute friendly negotiations. The foundation of world peace must be strengthened considerably to solve these international physical problems.

World Peace Needs Progressive Education That Expands Warm Feelings

Progressive education of individuals for world peace must start in the family homes as discussed previously, but would develop strongly in better schools and would continue the learning process throughout each persons life time because world conditions change. Still, the world would become more peaceful when more people would learn to become more useful citizens on a progressive friendly basis. This improvement in the training of people for peace would require some changes in the worlds educational systems and the objective of the improvements would be to make the learning process more involved with warm feelings.

The instruction in highly progressive schools would unite warm feelings of students learning improved topics on a regular schedule. The main subjects that would be taught in a progressive class room, including reading, writing, mathematics, science and problem solving, would always be more peacefully attractive and economically useful. Then, students would become more cooperative in their learning process. One important requirement for a warm feeling education would be to have a limited number of students per competent teacher in each class room. These desirable limits for student numbers in each school class would probably call for a large increase in the number of well trained teachers with warm feelings in every country. Then, teachers would be judged on the basis of their friendly instruction skills and would never be judged with any discrimination because of race or culture. Also, student grades would measure their temporary learning accomplishments according to class standards. Students with low grades would be given an opportunity to increase their initial grades to decrease the number of undesirable drop-outs.

The worlds educational systems presently concentrate on giving students instruction in elementary mental development in simple subjects. But, in order to help establish world peace, all international schools should expand the subjects that they are teaching to include more advanced mental skill development, better individual health care for humans of all ages and valuable emotional warm feelings in personal relationships. With the instillation of this better group of subjects in education, there would be a substantial improvement in training for all people in a peaceful international relationships. Many different kinds of businesses would develop, so practically all employable members of worlds various societies would have jobs. ^{they would be} Hopefully improving the environment, stabilizing all economies and expanding science. Very possibly the relationships between nations would be less aggressive and more harmonious, if practically all of their people were able to take fairly good care of their own health with improved nutrition and skill in using safety rules. Special respect for human health should expand the research on preventing diseases and should demand special care for hungry babies as well as the disadvantaged elderly. Then, the world would become a remarkably compassionate globe for all people to live, if they were well trained to love all people in other countries as well as all others in their own nations. Individual warm feelings would become stronger uniting emotions when they are started in the early lives of children at homes and in the educational systems. The solutions of all human problems would benefit from the enormous cooperation that would be obtained from the worlds population developing superior warm feelings.

In a peaceful country warm feelings would continue into the next level of education. Progressive high schools have a variety of different classes that give students of each grade several teachers from each of whom they receive different friendly instruction usually for a one hour period. The short period of contact would challenge teachers to make fast relationships with their students, so the number of students per class would be limited to about twenty five as a help to the teachers responsibilities. These students are becoming adults who are going to encounter worlds problems, so they would be given an introduction to advanced warm feelings, useful technology and peaceful family activities. High schools would even have compulsory classes to train students to avoid common hazzards of young adults. The tremendous responsibility of sex would be given extra careful presentation. Also, the hazzards of various addictions, including drugs, alcohol and tobacco, would receive compulsory courses that might make more students decide to become reliable adults.

Colleges, Universities and Graduate Schools in a peaceful society would still give students their choices of classes and teachers in keeping with their ambitions. After they have selected their major subject, these advanced students would be confronted with the special goal of making the profession of their choice more friendly and more cooperative. Society in a peaceful world needs professions that have warmer feelings and provide better management and consultation services that would always use more science, economics and what should be occuring in a peaceful world. Then, the highly educated people would help decrease terrorist activities, would build up the world economy and would supervise the preservation of the world environment.

2. In the world that was dedicated to peace progressive education would not cease with the regular training for a profession. The additional training would continue through every warm persons life, because conditions would keep changing in the world and for each person. As these problems change individuals with warm feelings would need to change their knowledge, understanding and remedial thinking to accomodate all changes. This continuous emotional, mental and physical education would require special research and careful recognition of what was essential to keep spreading warm feelings. These investigations would explore the individuals devotions in order to improve their emotional, mental and physical activities. The studies would determine how to strengthen world economic cooperation and how to promote human safety. The individual training would attempt to eliminate any discrimination against races in a community and would try to make social services impartial and just. In particular warm individuals would make more efforts to keep the earths environment in an acceptable condition, so the globe would be a safe place for human beings to live. As a means for trying to keep their progressive education in action the participants with warm feelings would struggle to improve governments by making them more democratic and more cooperative in the United Nations. The instruction would persuade individuals to combine with others in a number of organizations that would work for world peace.

Advanced Education Would Promote Refined Peaceful Ambitions

During their years of advanced progressive training peaceful individuals would almost always develop ambitions to accomplish important achievements in their activities. Their warm feelings would stimulate ambitious resolutions of both male and female individuals to become valuable members of society. There would be many decisions that would have to be made warmly in a peaceful family and they would need to be made in cooperation. Where an educated family settles would be governed by various factors including where their individual ambitions could be given good opportunities. Human ambitious achievements would have different chances of success in different places. But, the success of ambitions seems to depend mostly on the determination of the concerned individual to exercise warm feelings.

One outstanding ambition of peaceful individuals would be to obtain good economic security. The natural desire of the ambitious who would need security would be to obtain reasonable incomes in occupations that would help them in their ambitions and would give them enjoyment. These aspiring workers would struggle to be successful and maybe indispensable in peaceful jobs. Their warm feelings would be rewarding to them as employees who work hard on the job and make successful progress in their peaceful accomplishments. They might even get promotions to higher levels of employment where they could work harder for peace. Professionals frequently start their own businesses with great hope for success in making special contributions to their societies. Peaceful individuals with talents would exercise their warm feelings and creative skills to become achievers.

One remarkable ambition of peaceful people with strong warm feelings would be to do volunteer work during time outside of occupational work and on vacations. Many important social services are quite dependent on volunteers to perform sacrificial jobs on their own free will. Many concerned people love to exercise their special interests in helping the needy who are in trouble without receiving pay. Actually competent individuals obtain learning satisfactions by devoting some of their spare time to providing free services to organizations that carry out important business duties for the community. Sacrificial volunteer work in democracies is great evidence of freedom for their citizens to exercise their ambitions for peace.

Effective people with warm feelings would be resolved to support organizations and governments that are active in providing important social services by contributing a fair share of the money that is needed. So, with these ambitions the concerned people would pay membership fees to active groups, make special monetary contributions to valuable functions and pay taxes to democratic governments that work on social problems. Also, the ambitious individuals would show their support for peaceful action by talking to the public in a friendly manner about the social problems that they want solved. Then, the organizations that are dedicated to helping people who require social services become more ambitious when members acquire more warm feelings and express their desire for the peaceful activities to be more effective. Aspirations for social progress spread around quite easily by highly concerned ambitious people.

Group Social Action For World Peace Promotes Warm Feelings.

People with warm feelings discover that they are able to provide help for solving world social problems when they join organizations having local groups. A local group that is working fairly effectively together on an important problem has a special opportunity to exercise warm feelings with their associates. For successful action each local group needs to have an efficient structure in the form of a president, treasurer, secretary and special activists. The closer these officers, who have special charges, work together in agreement the more strength the group possesses. Also, the nearer the leaders keep to the members of the group the more friendly the peaceful association becomes. The spreading of friendliness among group members strengthens unity and develops warm feelings.

Any group that wants to be fairly effective in their peace action has some obligations to carry out. This group would have regular meetings where members would be informed of progress or lack of progress that has occurred. All committees would make reports to spread this information. Then, speakers would be brought in to some meetings as a means of generating enthusiasm. Special communication would be made with members to obtain as much cooperation as possible. Individual associations would be encouraged to expand unity. Then, the group would be kept economically sound by charging an annual fee and by developing means for making money. The primary activity of the group would be to enlist more people that are concerned with the special peace problems that the group is working on.

World peace organizations that focus effective action on helping to solve immediate social problems usually generate their own warm feelings. The wonderfulness of their goals is one of the deciding factors in the remarkable emotions that are generated in the members of every social service group that work together quite cooperatively.

Social problems are so numerous and serious that these groups have become important segments in society, when they help to produce beneficial effects with their warm emotions. Actually the world is strongly in need of many more organizations that work together effectively for improving world peace conditions with the warmth of emotional feelings that tend to unite more people. The warmth of feelings might even determine the goals that each effective social service group strives for as objectives.

As more social service groups that are effective in working for world peace are needed in the world today, members of many groups would be trained in better cooperation with warm feelings. Individual constituents would be learning more effective procedures for working on problems that the service is concerned about. Such groups would establish better structural coordination to take charge of the different divisions of the service. More efforts would be made to obtain the best leadership and meetings of the organizations would have agendas that would involve all attendants. Present situations in their social action would be made clearer than expected to the people in the meetings to stimulate their warm feelings. Progress in working on problems would be given emphasis.

Peaceful Religious Groups Confront Confusing Problems Of World Peace

Most of worlds religions have developed a high level of loving feelings in their members for other members of their faith. However, in their confusing problems the differential group beliefs exert strong forces, which create segregating emotional distinctions between many different religious groups. These emotional separations of religions have generated several religious wars in the past and have continued to produce considerable violence between some religions, which warm feelings must stop. The present indications, that are obtained from the violence, are that important warm feelings can be restricted to members of any group that wants to separate itself from other groups. Now that the world is longing for peace, this break down of warm feelings between any religions, which emotion is essential for world peace, should be avoided.

More action for world peace can be expected from all religions, because their warm feelings would be strengthened by their experiences in local communities that would teach them how to unite religious people world wide. The favorable hope for world wide unity of religious people would be founded on the peaceful work that most religions do together in local communities. Different religions would place their different beliefs in the background of the social action and the different religions would emphasize warm feelings for all human beings, if they expand their activities that they learn from their experiences in local communities.

The world has a number of religious organizations that do a remarkable job of developing warm feelings in local communities. The wonderful objective of peaceful religions is the promoting of more love in their members, so they do more social services in their areas. An amazing achievement of these loving religions is their producing local groups in most dwelling places of nations around the world. Warm feelings may have some restrictions between groups with different beliefs, but the social activities give different groups special opportunities to spread their love through out the community. In particular, warm feelings would have special opportunities to bring most religious people together when they work together and have similar organizations. An important feature of most religious organizations is that a local group would have sub groups for members of different ages. Instruction in love starts with young children and continues to the elderly in these different sub groups. Warm feelings of people benefit from the extended practice of love while growing up.

The training love gives members of local religious groups special abilities to develop leadership in working on social services with warm feelings. Religious sub groups give their members repeated opportunities to obtain guidance, so some of them develop important skills in warm leadership after they become adults. Well trained adults might produce preschools for the community. The matured individuals become active in community organizations that feed the hungry and provide housing for the homeless or the crisis shelters. With their special training in warm feelings, religious individuals practically always become relatively good parents in their homes.

Peaceful religious countries must expand their warm feelings at a fast rate to include other religious faiths, because the world is confronted with religious wars. Many of the nations that threaten the world with conflicts have religious dictatorships, So, an important step toward world peace would be for religious nations, which are ruled by leaders having absolute power, to turn definitely to democracy. Then, different religious democracies might be able to develop enough warm feelings for each other to accept each others goals. Two or more religious faiths might learn to live in the same democracy, if most elected authorities were given some unity with their more highly developed warm feelings.

A good measure of economic cooperation between religious democracies might create some unity. All nations have economic problems, some of which are needs for goods and services in the consumer market and some of which are excessive amounts of goods and services for exchange. Thus, international trade between different democratic religious nations, as well as between ordinary democracies and religious nations, offers as useful means for developing peaceful warm feelings. World peace may have a dependence on warm feelings that are generated by international well being and help for solutions of individual physical and mental difficulties. Unemployment and human misfortunes can frequently stimulate friendly interaction. All countries with separate religious beliefs might become relatively peaceful by adopting some economic cooperation. Friendliness would grow, if democratic religious countries would allow their people to obtain entertaining information about broad warm human relationships. World peace has vast need for the uniting love that might be generated by highly cooperating religions.

Environmental Problems Require Warm Feelings For Peaceful Solutions

Earth's air problems call for special attention by people who are concerned about world peace. As an example, various reports of earth's temperature measurements indicate that earth is liable to suffer from global warming. Calculated effects of this increase in temperature on the expansion of oceans threaten the population along the shores with inundation by the salt water. Such environmental problem for all nations along the vast oceans demands careful study and production of adequate means for decreasing the development of materials in earth's air that might serve as a heat blanket. Any effective study would require an enormous amount of average temperature measurements and gas analyses over the whole earth for many years. The immense area of the study must be based on the fact that earth's ocean area is much greater than its land area.

Among earth's minor gases with large molecules, which might create a blanket that would hold heat on the globe, is carbon dioxide. This heavy gas is one of the products of the combustion of carbonaceous fuels for the development of heat, energy and light for people. Thus the increase in human population and the expansion of their technologies has augmented their demand for manufacturing, transportation and physical comfort. Most of this combustion of carbonaceous fuels takes place on land areas, so dwelling places, factories, automobiles, trucks and power plants are putting most of carbon dioxide in about a third of the earth's area. Then, the amount of carbon dioxide that is blown over the oceans by wind is subject to its high solubility in water. So, much of this gas dissolves in ocean water where ocean plants can consume it for growth. Also, carbon dioxide that remains on land is essential for the growth of trees and other green leaf plants. A much larger number of these green leaf plant growths are valuable for producing food, fuel and structures for human beings. In addition, these wonderful green leaf plants convert earths carbon dioxide into oxygen, which is extremely important for human beings to breath. People with warm feelings need more oxygen.

Improvement in the studies of the quality of earths air might well be started now by people with warm feelings having clean air legislation by governments. If the pessimistic estimates of the development of a carbon dioxide heat blanket around the whole earth should turn out to be fairly correct, the studies of the probable damage might ^{be} tragically realistic. Melting ice structures would expand oceans until large areas of its shores would be inundated with water that would cause enormous irreparable damage. Studies of temperatures on oceans and lands should be increased considerably to try to discover any increase in average temperature on the whole earth. Also, people with warm feelings should work on the possible green house effect of carbon dioxide for the next several decades and plant more trees as well as green plants to help decrease the build up of carbon dioxide and increase the concentration of oxygen on earth. Research on the building of transportation vehicles might well be continued by investigators with warm feelings, who want to improve the air. Human beings would save money, if private vehicles would use less or cheaper fuels for their energy operations. Traffic congestion would probably decrease, if more commuters would use public transportation that did not discharge questionable gases.

Exhaust air from manufacturing plants presents world peace with other problems. Most cities around the world produce smog that is irritating to the inhabitants and demands special control by authorities. Especially, warm feeling environmentalists must expand their efforts to decrease the power plant burning of fuels like coal that have significant percentage of sulfur compounds, because these plants discharge sulfuric acid in their exhaust gases. Some power plants have been burning coal with too much sulfur for years and their exhaust acid has fallen on earths areas growing valuable trees that have been killed. So, efforts must be made by concerned people to have all power plants scrub the sulfuric acid from their exhausts or to have them use non sulfur fuels for their energy.

Earths air environment suffers particular damage from the presence of chlorofluorocarbons that are used in air conditioners, refrigerators and various aerosol manufactured products. This special chemical for coolers has been discovered by warm feeling studies as a material which speeds up the disappearance of the very important protective ozone layer in earths upper atmosphere. This ozone layer has the important function of shielding earth from ultraviolate radiation from the sun. Any increase in ultraviolate light on earth causes skin cancers and eye catracks, while it suppresses the human immune system system and farm crop growth rate. Fortunately, warm feeling people are making a big effort to replace this damaging chemical with one that would have a much smaller effect of eliminating the protective ozone layer. Earths population may escape any increase in ultraviolate light.

The oceans occupy about two thirds of the total area of earth and participate enormously in worlds environmental activities. So, concerned people with warm feelings need to keep studying the important properties of many ocean waters to try to evaluate their contribution in land weather, including tornadoes, wind and rain fall. Also, ocean waters along land shores should be kept fairly pure for local use and toxic wastes should be poured very carefully only into special regional waters that can refresh them. Substantial efforts should be made to prevent oil tankers from spilling into the oceans enough oil to cover large areas of the water and spread to the land. World peace might include careful cooperation between people with warm feelings and their wonderful oceans.

Adequate amount of good quality water is needed in earths land environment for human consumption, farmers crops and industrial operations. This valuable water falls to earth as rain and accumulates in lakes,,rivers and underground layers. After it is collected, treated and used for its regular purpose, quality water is given more treatment and is returned to its probable origin in the earth. Thus, water problems have a number of divisions for land users including finding pure enough water, giving it satisfactory treatment for human needs, using it without contamination, cleaning it so it meets replenishing requirements and pumping it into supply water that is pure enough to be regarded as having good quality. Cities need to make certain that they get sufficient amounts of good quality water and farmers need enough good quality water to irrigate their dry fields. People with warm feelings have considerable responsibility to help maintain an adequate supply of good quality water on land.

The natural open areas of earth's land that are used for farming are important segments of the environment that are keys to world peace. These areas are quite valuable because their farm crops are essential to provide food for people and their useful animals. The problems facing the conservation of farm lands are complex, but three difficulties are getting some recognition. One serious land situation is the thinning of the soil on farm land from the washing off of the upper layer by the watering process. Therefore the irrigation operation needs improvement so the topsoil is kept in place on location during the watering of crop fields. Creating a second difficulty, some farm land is irrigated with somewhat contaminated water that spoils the fertility of the soil. As a consequence, the quality of water that is pumped on farm land needs careful supervision. A third serious land trouble is the spreading of industrial and urban areas over the farm areas, because the human population is increasing and cities are expanding. So, adequate preservation of earth's productive soil requires careful consideration by people with warm feelings.

The world peace feature of earth environmental problems is that they get more serious as the human population increases and becomes more technically advanced without adequate education. This inhabitant density cause of the increase in the seriousness of environmental problems demands the expansion and improvement in education, particularly in the field of family size control. Then, families might become smaller and more people might become aware of the environmental troubles that are facing the earth. Some kind of a world organization needs to make estimates of the reasonable population for various earth areas in terms of probable employment and the severity of environmental problems. Then, all countries would try for full employment of their citizens, so there would be a minimum number of poor people and a maximum investment of wealth in progressive businesses. All recommended numbers of people for different earth areas would consider their races, their religions and their ability to cooperate with each other. Peoples interests in the effect of population density on the environment need to be carefully considered. If warm feeling individuals get more active in this environmental improving process, the earth may become a safer place for people to live.

World Peace Economics Has Urgent Need For Warm Feelings

Centuries ago peaceful people established economies by developing transactions that resulted in the exchange of all kinds of goods and services between individuals. Then, these economies expanded and became more cooperatively helpful when many small political units established a measure of freedom for warm feeling people to make many kinds of business transactions. Eventually governments developed moneys as special exchange materials for economies that had useful income and trade values but no worth for human consumption. With this exchange money as income consumers and businesses built increasing amount of buying and selling of food, clothing, water, energy, buildings, transportation facilities and many services. Then, the invention and production of machinery expanded the vast number of transactions in many economies. Exchange money, in the form of prices for goods and services, has increased in individual and national basis until money has become one of the regulators of economies. The warmth of feelings of people in economies determines how their money is used.

Economics eventually became complicated around the world by the importance of developing the exchange of many goods and services into businesses between nations. Different countries became capable of producing different desirable consumer goods, largely in the form of food and manufactured products. So, the nations that wanted goods from other countries found special ways to accomplish this transaction by the international exchange method. This international exchange of materials created the expanding process of trade between countries. So, now the economies of some countries are highly dependent on international trade, because the different supply of many important materials and services is a substantial variable around the world. Fortunately, the warm feelings of people who have supplied needed materials have made world trade an important segment of international economics. Although different countries have quite different moneys, most of them have cooperative business managements and world trade is largely dependent on world peace.

Unfortunate world situations, such as wars, over population, uncooperative governments and bad weather conditions, have made the present present economies of different countries quite unequal in their abilities to support the welfare of people. These international difficulties are not improving at a desirable rate. A substantial number of nations need enormous increases in the warm feelings of their inhabitants, so they can create societies that have economies which are capable of providing good living conditions for worlds people. In particular, the world economy must be working strongly to prevent any massive starvation of the poor by lack of economic cooperation.

The economic exchange of all kinds of commodities has required the employment of management and workers to provide mental and physical efforts for production and distribution of necessities on the market. So, the percent of people who have needed incomes and have been employed in jobs has become one measure of success for an economy. But, some of the employed people have received large incomes, while most of the employed have obtained relatively small incomes. The investors and speculators who are successful become rich, while the unemployed and low income people become poor. So, the prosperity of a country depends on the average incomes of all citizens, and a warm feeling economy would spend a substantial amount of its money that would be contributed by citizens in the form of taxes in order to provide poor citizens with valuable services. Corporations would supply the market with with increasing kinds of goods and services for the poor, many of which would improve in quality. Most warm feeling economies would respond favorably to the requirements of people in need.

In the recent time period the prices of many goods, services and properties have gone up so high that buyers have needed to barrow money in order to make consumer purchases. Also, many employed people have saved money, which they wanted to spend later, with the help of various money businesses. So, the banking and saving and loan businesses became important segments of society. Local banks are usually quite safe organizations to handle citizens needs for deposit and credit services. But the saving and loan businesses have developed a crisis that has robbed people of an enormous amount of money. Hopefully, governments will be able to make all organizations honest who handle peoples deposit and credit services with warm feelings.

Friendly democratic governments play important roles in economics and now are involved in the oversight of the sale of business capital. Most large businesses become economically stable by selling stocks in the company to give it operating money. Gathering these transactions together in large cities has built several stock markets, where a high percent of business stocks are bought and sold on a daily basis. Some warm feeling private enterprisers publish their judgements of correct stock values. But, now the buying of stocks is done on a gambling type speculating basis, so friendly governments are obligated to keep close inspection of buying and selling stocks to detect any corruption in these market transactions. Buyers may be able to make their stock purchases more wisely in the future by the action of organizations with warm feelings.

To keep their economies responsible in the business world, friendly governments should take careful control of their tax collection and total expenditures. This means that government income from taxes should be adequate to cover administration expenditures. Unfortunately, numerous governments go heavily in debt to fight wars or to give special contributions to other countries, while maintaining the expenditures for relieving their ordinary national problems. As a result, countries with these debts must obtain greater incomes to pay off this borrowed money and its interest. Applying more taxes on citizens income, property, sales and other things are enormous jobs that are frequently not done very well or very fairly. So, governments with debts have immense responsibilities to handle their incomes justly with the help of citizens having warm feelings.

The world conflicts and the practice of preparing for the next war have many harmful effects on the economies of most nations. Wars disrupt the cooperative distribution of goods and services in involved countries as well as their peaceful international relationships. World peace requires more investment in the development of 1. better consumer products, 2. improved human health, 3. safer transportation, 4. long lasting energy materials, 5. valuable sources of water, electricity, gas and other building necessities, and 6. a good earth environment. But, the international conflicts and the preparation for the next war cost so much money that these important investments for peaceful world inhabitants are interrupted. The preparation of means to make conflicts more destructive has stimulated research in the realm of technology, but world peace needs more technological research in the production of consumer products. Some efforts have been made to improve the physical abilities of warriors on the battle field, but the diseases and physical disorders of peaceful people require great increased curing studies. The military system designs and builds remarkable tanks, planes and conveying vehicles, still the general world population is calling for safer cars, airplanes and trains. The war weapon detonators are designed to produce extremely energetic explosions, still the general peaceful world population wants to work for cheaper and longer lasting energy producing materials. Some military developments make progress in providing water, electricity and other consumer necessities for military activities, while most peaceful consumers want more and cheaper requisit necessities at homes and businesses.

During wars, military action makes numerous attempts to destroy parts of the earths environment, while one of the most important peace time problems is the preservation of the earths environment. Warm feelings have enormous problems of transferring money from the military to important peace time requirements. But, the world is extraordinarily in need of emotional, mental and physical education requirements for creating enough warm feelings to cut the military expenditures. Preparation of a military build-up and activities of a violent war cost so much money that it puts many nations in debt. But, a careful transfer of much of this government war money to peace time developments might very well be accomplished by warm feeling cooperation of governments, citizens and businesses. Then, world peace might be relatively successful in stabilizing most nations economies.

With Some Warm Feelings Science Makes Progress Toward World Peace

Wonderful contributions to the progress of human beings has been made by science in its discoveries of how the universe operates from the smallest particles to the largest objects and also how the remarkable human beings could develop their inventive skills. The progress in scientific discovery of valuable information has been enormous. Unfortunately, a substantial section of recent scientific research has been devoted to developing weapons for killing people in wars and intercepting enemies missiles. Armament people may argue that the development of enormously destructive weapons has made the earth more peaceful. But, this argument cannot serve the warm feeling interests of earths highly concerned inhabitants as peace approaches. For people with warm feelings peace requires more information about human problems to make earth safer place to live and human relationships to insure their improvement.

With the development of world peace making progress, science would devote more time on its special interest in particle physics. Experiments in these studies would make more progress in revealing valuable forces in the universe and possibly in disclosing the existence of more subatomic particles. Human beings who learn more about the structure of their atoms, molecules and cells would be getting valuable additional scientific knowledge. Also, science would make more peaceful progress investigating the finest particles of the universe than by using any of them destructively in wars. Then, more of the elements of the periodic table might be given broader studies, so additional useful materials might be discovered and put into action.

People with warm feelings have special desires for more scientific information and speculation about the origin of life and the development of healthy human beings. Any reasonable explanation of the process that led to the formation of different races might improve human relationships on earth. Now that the vast number of human beings are covering much of the earth they would appreciate scientific investigations of their serious personal problems. Especially people want to know more about how their internal body parts operate. Science might help people make various kinds of growth progress by discovering some details of how the brain governs the performance by the other segments of the overall person. Special care for eyes, ears, teeth and noses calls for much more study and better distribution of treatments. Human appendage problems might be given more relief, if actions of arms and legs were given more experimental investigations. Also, various organs of the body should be studied to help people remain healthy. A tremendous amount of research is needed to disclose the importance of good diets and good exercises. More scientific studies are essential to stimulate more people to do a better job of avoiding diseases. Disclosure of the hazards of using drugs, consuming alcohol and smoking tobacco have been beneficial for people with warm feelings.

World peace problems, which require considerable help from warm feeling scientists, include the need to develop more energy, cheaper energy and safer energy, because the world population is increasing and getting more requirements for powerful mechanical equipment. Expansion of transportation apparatus creates one of the serious energy problems, because the supply of oil to make fuel for engines is limited and the combustion products of the modern oil fuels produce air quality problems. Also, the world has other sources of energy and scientific research may be able to invent means for making a clean fuel type of energy available for transportation and other high power devices. The world will always appreciate having a higher quality air.

Energy development that deserves expanded scientific research is electricity, so this wonderful resource is more available around the world for numerous purposes. Electricity is a widespread utility in many countries. But, the complicated means for generating this utility product requires scientific surveys to determine that the present systems can be expanded and continued indefinitely as public services. The use of electrical instruments is enormous. Still, more world people need electric lights, electric motors, TVs, telephones, refrigerators, storage batteries, electric stoves and microwave ovens. Also, nearly all people will want to have these essential instruments indefinitely. Warm feelings are making some progress in expanding the use of electrical instruments world wide.

The good health of people around the world has been dependent on the research of scientists who have developed many ailment preventive and curative chemicals. The wonderful remedial discoveries by nutrition scientists has been the various vitamins and special minerals, which the human body requires in food at sufficient level. Scientific research on vitamins in food should be given more progress although individuals can run useful experiments on themselves. Among the well known vitamin chemicals Vitamin A is essential in the human diet for the eyes of persons to see with more clarity and with less fatigue. Quite a number of Vitamin B chemicals have been found that work together in body cells to aid in the production of human energy and the carrying out of good body functions, when injected in adequate amounts. A substantial amount of Vitamin C intake has been shown to combat viruses and detoxify foreign substances in human bodies, which protects healthy people from many abnormalities. Further discoveries by nutritionists indicate that Vitamin D is an important food ingredient to help in the absorption of calcium by bones. Also, the findings show an adequate consumption of Vitamin E insures that human muscles and nerves will work well so heart disease might be suppressed. Many other valuable food constituents have been discovered and studied by scientists. The big problem of getting the valuable food information spread out to all people is the need to introduce nutrition knowledge into all educational systems. In the mean time scientists are devoting considerable efforts to develop cures for serious human diseases.

A serious difficulty for which the world requires considerable help from science for many solutions is the recycling of most wastes and the recovering of useful materials from human discards. Household and business wastes are becoming enormously bulky and variable in nature. Also, disposal operations are getting to be difficult and somewhat hazardous. As the problem increases with time a special science should face the many segments of the difficulty including collection of the wastes, separation of the various materials according to diversity, separation of each variety into constituents and collection as well as purification of each valuable constituent.

constituent. Metals may be fairly easy to separate from the mixture of wastes. But, most cans and metal containers are covered with plastics, which must be removed before the metal becomes available for chemical analysis and recovery treatment. After the metal wastes are assembled as clean metallic materials they may be subjected to refining processes or may be melted up into special alloys.

Fortunately, news papers are recycled in large quantities at present because they are easy to separate from other wastes and the recycling process is well developed. Still, unless the consumers and businesses are forced to do a successful job of separating their waste materials, collected wastes might contain paper, plastics, glass, cloth, leather, dirt, wood and other things that might include toxic substances. The research on the large scale separation of waste materials seems to be under way as many plastics can be separated from paper and cardboard to some degree, so the friendly world may have recycled bags in time. However, much more scientific research with warm feelings will be necessary to work on the recycling problems.

Peaceful concerned people are stimulated by scientific studies of land and oceans. Discoveries of how earth became a beautiful globe and how its oceans and lands were developed are inspiring to warm feelings. Now the protection of earths environment should be given more help by scientific investigations. Then, changes in climatic conditions should be transmitted to earths inhabitants and these people must be instructed in how to keep climatic conditions favorable. Such instruction is valuable, because most of earths environmental problems are produced by people.

Peaceful Democracies Count Strongly On Warm Feelings

When democratic governments become more of the people, by the people and for the people, the citizen relationships need increasing amount of warm feelings. Each of these three expressions Of democracy require special attention and response by the citizens who have concerns about their freedoms. Liberty in a democratic country depends on way opportunities are observed and responsibilities are assumed as obligations. Laws must be fairly just and a high percent of the people must be willing to obey them. But, the rights of free people are partly limited by the integrity and the requirements of their associates. In democracies people can live according to their own convictions provided they do not break laws or interfere with the convictions of others. Still, the enjoyment of their lives may depend on the warmth of their feelings during their peaceful existence.

The first qualification that peaceful democratic governments have in being of-the-people makes these governments accept a large number of different citizens with different characters into their nations. The majority of the people may be the kind that exerts the most political force on democratic government action. But, the of-the-people qualification requires all democratic governments to produce constitutions which recognize the political rights of all people. The variety of people who may want separate political rights may differ in race, religion, language or economic well being. But, a peaceful democracy that has sufficient warm feelings would accede to the political freedoms of all people with different natures and abilities.

Warm feelings have substantial jobs of overcoming racism, which is a serious human relationship problem around the world even in some democracies. However, by using their warm feelings members of any race can discover that members of any other race can be very friendly and cooperative. Most separating racial differences can be overcome when special interests are congenial. But, warm inter racial feelings are quite essential around the world, because of the large number of races that exist on earth. If countries with peaceful democracy are able to reach an advanced stage, they will need to develop a high level of inter racial acceptance. When all nations reach a peaceful state of working together in one world, all races will ^{acquire} a great deal of collaboration.

Democratic governments of-the-people must overcome racism with warm feelings, because different races will be in the world for an indefinite time. Countries with different races, one of which is a vast majority, must develop governments that ^{learn} how to treat minorities better politically and learn how to cooperate with other countries that have governments which are dominated by other races. Actually the value of friendly inter racial relationships is becoming more evident in some democracies. Slowly but steadily minority races are acquiring a fair measure of political power and responsibility. In particular, minority races are welcomed in athletics, music and entertainment areas of democracies and a certain amount of racial discrimination is decreasing in various jobs. So, the principal way that a majority race is influential in deciding the pathway of city living is limiting the areas where a minority is welcomed as residents. Hopefully warm feelings will increase the harmony between city residential areas.

The qualification of democratic governments being of-the-people makes true democracies face the problem of representing people in their countries who are members of different religions. In some cases of questionable democracies the countries might have one national religion and would not be able to demonstrate their acceptance of individual rights for religious freedom. But, the democratic qualification of being of-the-people reverses any situation in which a government prescribes what religion their people should adopt. Also, any fairly friendly nation would not use its national religion to separate it from another country by developing poor relationships. Democracies have special need for religious freedom in their countries and around the world.

Among the various means for sending friendly messages in democracies that are of-the-people the transmission of spoken and written words is very important. Therefore communication of warm feelings are somewhat limited when a number of different languages in a country make inter language messages a little difficult. Information and messages do not create friendly relationships with unknown words. Fortunately, messages from one language are converted to another fairly often in democracies, because bilingual translators work hard for newspapers and TV. But, some people are so proud of their language, which they were taught while they were growing up, that they do not want to communicate with others who speak, read and write another language. Language differences may continue to separate people unless governments of-the-people work effectively on the problem with warm feelings.

All citizens in a democracy, who have quite variable economic well being, require adequate political recognition by their government of-the-people. The situation may always exist that wealthy people develop more political power in a democracy, because any campaign for public office requires the expenditure of considerable amount of donated money. But, the remarkable feature of democracy is that all citizens possess authority over the government of-the-people. So, democratic governments of-the-people must recognize the authority of all citizens, what ever their economic well being. Warm feelings equate the political possessions of people in democracies.

As democracies are required to have governments by-the-people, this third qualification needs careful study in all of these countries. These investigations must determine how the democratic elected officials are influenced by the informed voters that vote in the elections. Also, efforts should be made to get a high percent of the eligible voters to vote in every election, with warm feelings. At present a high percent of the actual voters are biased too much by advertising that is paid for by wealthy people who would be benefited by the advertised result of the vote. Thus, governments by-the-people need to made considerable efforts to give voters in every democratic election process reasonably correct information about each side of of every ballot issue. Then, officials in governments by-the-people might become pressured by well informed voters with warm feelings rather than the wealthy who want to be richer.

In peaceful democratic governments, which administer human rights for-the-people, elected officials need to be well informed about their peoples welfares and goals as well as what could be done to improve them in order to help bring about world peace. This information requires administrators to become aware of what changes a majority of the citizens want to make in government action. Then, when these changes are constitutionally legitimate, legislative officials have the obligation to pass laws that are agreed to by the majority of the citizens in order to construct a government for-the-people.

The responsibilities of democratic governments for-the-people reach into nearly every problem faced by citizens. Among the important improvements that these governments should make is to insure that people are better educated from the cradle to the grave. Learning and understanding is a valuable asset for citizens. The earths environment needs careful attention by governments for-the-people to preserve human surroundings. Air and water conditions are getting worse. A responsibility that should be more active in democracies is to make their societies safer for people. At present, an enormous number of people live in hazzardous conditions. On a continuing basis every democratic country needs action for-the-people to keep their economy making some progress. Economies are in an unsatisfactory state in too many countries with high unemployment, huge debts, poor trade, inferior enterprise and considerable corruption. All of the remedial actions on these problems require warm feelings in the governments for-the-people.

Remarkable enough governments for-the-people are given some recommendations to authorities, so they will realize more problems that the people want them to resolve. When citizens make strong suggestions, they place them into special propositions on ballots of an election. The signatures of many qualified voters are essential to get the voters at the election to urge government for-the-people to provide better services. As an important means for informing governments of the additional assistance required by people, citizen organizations who have specific needs in solving their problems are encouraged to employ lobbyists to communicate with government officials and enlighten them as to the need for helping the human situation. The peaceful action of democratic governments for-the-people must be to make human lives better and more just with warm feelings.

To establish a justice system democratic governments for-the-people have created judicial demartments and apprehending units in all of their country, state and community organizations. After the legal departments enact laws that are permitted by the people and the constitutions, the enforcing departments take over the job of compelling obedience. Possible law breakers are apprehended and brought to court where they are brought to trial in order to determine their guilt. The verdict is pronounced by a jury and the punishment for law breaking is determined by a judge on a prescribed just basis. Thus, the quality of justice in societies that is desirable for world peace depends on fairness of the laws, conditions leading to crimes, integrity of the apprehenders, resolution of cases in courts and sentencing of guilty persons. Fairness of justice is the responsibility of governments for-the-people that is influenced by the warm feelings of the citizens.

Warm Feelings Are Expanded By Social Services In Democracies

World peace is becoming increasingly achievable with the development of warm feelings in democratic communities by the creation of many more social services that improve the welfare of human beings from their inception. Warm feelings that are generated in local communities can be easily applied to world problems. So, fortunately the number of local social services that are found in many democracies is quite large and they start with the special ones for children in crisis shelters who have been mistreated or abandoned. These activities that put children into a warmer world usually produce substantial friendly rewards for both givers and receivers. Then, the helpful organizations that provide valuable recreational and vocational services for children and youths can produce considerable warm feelings in the younger generation. Also, training youths for peaceful jobs is a valuable social contribution of communities to world peace. The remarkable feature of the early development of warm feelings is that world peace may get ~~get~~ its best start in early human lives by wonderful social services that inject friendliness with helpfulness.

Social services provide adults with continuing opportunities to make their feelings warmer by providing them with organizations for their friendly advancement in democratic societies. Among the many adult service ^{the} means that contribute to people learning the value of friendliness are public libraries, public parks, music groups, art groups, discussion groups and entertainment clubs. Additional organizations that are quite essential services include hospitals, recycling centers and sanitation help. Even the building codes that most cities have are very helpful for people who are rebuilding their buildings after an earthquake. Then, social service that is highly improving for the warm feelings of both the giver and receiver is the organization that provides comfortable places to sleep for the homeless and unemployed, who otherwise would be sleeping in the parks or on the streets. Adults in democracies are furnished many chances to get enough warm feelings that might go far toward promoting world peace.

As people get older even in peaceful democracies more social services become quite essential for those that need special assistance. Senior citizen centers provide some of the health care and entertainment services, but more help is frequently needed by the elderly for physical and emotional reasons. The crippled and disabled require special physical treatments and any effective provisions that keep them somewhat active develops considerable warm feelings in both directions. Occasionally the necessary help, such as meals on wheels, can be given in the home, which makes the elderly more self contained. Now, many democratic governments produce a service that has been called Social Security, which helps the elderly achieve economic security after retirement. Another government assistance unit, which enables elderly to obtain some health assistance, is labeled Medicare in some countries. The people who help the elderly live longer and with more vitality acquire a substantial amount of warm feelings, which can be applied to their countries international relations.

An Organization Of Combined Democracies Might Be Useful For World Peace

The importance of cooperative democratic countries in the world struggle to achieve peace suggests that these democracies should unite to form an auxiliary world organization that develops their combined efforts for expanding peace. This democratic organization would be available for all nations that adopt a rule by a fair law philosophy that demands government of the people, by the people and for the people. The responsibility of the people in the democratic combination would be to observe human rights, when they vote in elections, and the gift they would receive would be the freedom to act lawfully to solve human problems. There would probably be only a few civil conflicts in any of these warm feeling countries and the number of nations in the combination would increase regularly with time.

A distinct function of this special combination of democratic nations would be to influence dictatorial countries to adopt democratic actions as well as policies and this persuasion would involve spreading information about the advantage that democratic free people have over dictatorial governed people in solving the vast number of human problems. Countries in the democratic combination would try to display their advantage in solving international relations problems, such as poor communication, limited freedom, discrimination against races and religions, high expenditures for the military, and weak authority of the people, in resolving world market economy problems such as poor development of industries, insufficient world trade, inadequate investment of capital, scanty health care and research, and unemployment at all ages, in improving social interaction, and in improving ^{defective} social interaction.

such as poor education, inferior news media, inadequate human responsibility, too much crime, extreme drug trafficking, dangerous transportation, risky banks and saving businesses, not enough help for the elderly, fourth in preserving the earths environment from disintegration such as global warming, ultra violate radiation, smoggy air, contaminated water and polluted soil. Friendly cooperation that might develop in the combination of democratic countries, CDC, might become appealing to most of the people in many dictatorships, so inhabitants in these authoritarian nations might change their government structure to democracy. The combination of democratic countries, CDC, might soon include practically all nations all over the world .

The joint action of the combined democratic countries, CDC, might incorporate all of the world progressive nations that are democracies by adopting four sections 1, Peaceful International relations, 2. Cooperative freemarket economy, 3. Warm social and political working together, and 4. Friendly and enduring environment. These four sections would stimulate CDC to create programs for solving most of the political, social, economic and environmental problems on earth.

Evidence that CDC has a possibility of becoming a valuable peace force is shown by the number of national groups that attempt to build international cooperation. These groups include the north atlantic treaty organization, NATO, the general agreement on tariffs and trade, GATT, organization for economic cooperation and development, OECD, Conference on security and cooperation, CSCE, and other organizations with concerns about limited international relationships. Obviously there are a number of nations who are anxious to work on world troubles in joint operations. So, the combination of democratic countries, CDC, may originate and become a world peace keeping reality.

To establish world peace responsible national governments have important duties of contributing to at least ~~nine~~ different kinds of environmental activities that might help develop safe, long-lasting energies and might aid in controlling air, water and land pollution. One studious activity involves acquiring data that discloses the severity of various environmental problems, including reasonably accurate average temperatures around the earth, fairly reliable carbon dioxide concentration in the air of the worlds globe, world energy requirements by nations, successful energy needs obtained from different sources in various countries, concentrations of CFC in diverse localities, amount of toxic wastes that are flooded into different waters and amount of damaging wastes (like radioactive compounds) that are deposited into earths occupied ground. Another environmental necessity requires studies of the various possibilities for improving the burning of fuels to produce more energy and less hazzards, including the more efficient less gasoline combustion, the wider burning of natural gas for energy, more use of ethanol in transportation vehicles, estimations of the usefulness of burning wood (biomass) for energy and the burning of fuels (including coal) in ways that would eliminate smog, A third environmental requirement from governmental studies includes investigations of the different evolving means for producing electricity, such as photovoltaic cells, wind blown propellers, available water that is dropped through turbines, special sodium sulfur storage batteries and geothermal sources with superconductive metals, from nuclear power plants, A fourth energy preservation study would require the evaluation of several more effective use of electricity, including more energy efficient electric motors for cars, houses and businesses, more usage of low-watt fluorescent light bulbs and lowering the charge per kilowatthour when the amount used in a given time is decreased; A fifth energy study would probe the wider use of the suns heat radiation, so it would investigate the use of special heat absorbers and would look in to combining heat absorbers with heat insulators to make the suns heat more available in many earth areas. A sixth energy environmental research project would need to investigate the importance of expanding the growth of vegetation and forests on land and the growth of green leaf plants in the ocean to control the carbon dioxide in earths atmosphere. A seventh investigation that would work on the environment and earths resources would determine the amount of wastes (partly toxic) that are flushed into oceans, rivers and lakes instead of being recycled. An eighth research project would study the hazzards of disposing the radioactive wastes from nuclear power plants and atomic bomb facilities to determine if atomic bombs should be built and if nuclear power could be made safe enough to supply some energy for human needs. A ninth important study would involve fairly accurate predictions of the energy situation after a period that might be thirty years, forecasting the difficulties if very few energy revisions were made and the probable improvements if renewable and conservative energy processes were adopted. If the study discloses the importance of energy renovation, the study would pressure businesses to develop and sell lasting energy materials. Governments putting large amounts of money into military budgets would not contribute as much to world peace as their using some of it for cooperative efforts to preserve earths environment and provide sufficient renewable energy.

World Peace Depends Strongly On Better International Relations

Evidence indicates that more warm feelings in international relations is the foundation of a real world peace, which exhibits friendly cooperation between nations and works to preserve earths important environment. This real peace requires substantial active friendly world relationships in addition to the absence of war or local violence. A high quality of peace in the world demands a high quality of human relationships and a high quality of international harmony along with a high degree of technical excellence. The mutual trusting people of the world who are working for peace need to get well acquainted with each other and to understand each others problems with mutual sympathy. Peace is a wonderful goal for mankind as it struggles to develop better international relations.

Any preparation for preventing world violence would involve many strategic warm feelings, some understanding thoughts and appreciable friendly actions by people concerned for world peace. The warm feelings in all international relations would regard violence in the world as an undesirable expression of anger and indignation that might be settled peacefully. Various differences in other people would be accepted as natural biological occurrences and criticisms of others would be made calmly with reasonable ideas. Hopefully bad government acts would become illegal and forgiveness would overcome any revenge that might be stimulated by vicious deeds. Then, national crimes would be excused after peaceful punishment for the criminal acts produces reformation. World friendliness would become more apparent to all countries that are contacted by communications with warm feelings.

A move toward a real world peace would proceed with international relations developing the friendly realization that countries, religions and races are naturally different. With this wide approval of peoples differences all inhabitants of the world with warm feelings would emphasize the similarities between peoples ideas, principles and attitudes. When difference would lead to discords, international negotiations and conferences would lead to agreements about what important remedial action should be applied to a problem. Then, further friendly communications might finally resolve most differences, so decisions would be regarded as prescribed experiments that would be given fair trials with warm feelings.

A more peaceful world would be possible with better international relations, when practically all nations would have a high level of democracy in their governments. These authorities of-the-people, by-the-people and for-the-people usually want to save their people from violence. Actually a majority of the people in representative countries are more likely to have peaceful warm feelings than an aggressive minority that has special power in a government that is not democratic. In fact, an expanding world peace is a valuable support for all democracies, where well trained people are the friendly top authority and the military division is not designed to protect a dictator. So citizens must produce a democratic government that has a minimum of corruption to its own benefit and a maximum of efforts to produce friendliness with other countries. Such governments would become active in promoting human rights around the world and this greater justice would increase the possibility of world peace.

The friendliness of international relations in a relatively peaceful world would increase considerably when all people in democracies were provided a high quality education. This high quality education would give people knowledge and understanding about the various nations of the world while they are learning basics. Then, the well informed and quite comprehensive members of various populations would improve the character of both governments and world peace. So, democratic governments would furnish relatively free quality education to all of their children while they are growing up. The subjects that would be given adequate presentation during this education would include the importance of friendly international relations and the necessity for action by governments with warm feelings to produce world peace. Actually, practically all of the people of the world need to be educated until they strive for world peace in the near future.

An important procedure that would help establish world peace would be to establish international economic cooperation with relatively free trade and more prosperity for nations experiencing starvation. The exchange of economic out puts creates relationships between nations that are strong and friendly. Countries like other countries to buy their goods and services, which is some times quite important. However peaceful arrangements should prevent any nation from entering the world market with a hazzardous product. The world might be more peaceful, if nations would not exchange drugs, tobacco or alcoholic beverages in the international market place. National authorities need a better chance to control the use of harmful chemicals and cooperative economics is necessary to stimulate important world businesses.

Better International Relations Depend Strongly On Warm Feelings

Earth's population is remarkably fortunate that its organizations have developed some warm feelings, because its various areas have produced nations that are different in their origins and their goals. But, peaceful relationships between nations require much cooperation, So, international relations have been in desperate need of an effective uniting force and warm feelings with its friendliness has furnished this merging emotional strength. The interaction of warm feelings takes advantage of the need for most nations to achieve interdependence with others with which they can develop cooperation. Each dual national relationship may be improved by special friendly working together. So, the relationship between nations with governments in various classes can make friendly approaches to people in other classes of authority who have warm feelings. But, the friendly approaches between people in different classes of nations are experimental and need to be given a search for unity, which requires considerable open communication.

The division of nations according to the strength of their warm feelings is usually created by differences in their governmental organizations. Separated divisions that are well recognized for their different internal warm feelings are democracies, dictatorships, communist states, religious nations and racial segregated nations. Fortunately, a large number of nations have democratic governments that are elected periodically by the majority of the people. But, many other nations are ruled by dictatorships that retain their government offices indefinitely by controlling the military.

If the dictatorial authority in a country takes over and runs the economy the government becomes communistic. Also, when the government is largely in the control of a religion the country usually develops a religious administration. Then, as a race takes over the government of a nation, the area becomes a racially segregated country. These various classes of nations present the emotion of warm feelings with enormous problems of developing worldwide friendliness and cooperation. But, solutions to the problems are strongly needed even though they require some massive goodwill approaches. For world peace nations of each class must learn to be friendly with each other as well as to develop warm feelings toward nations of different classes.

The number of world democracies is large and their international relationships are relatively friendly, although these associations can nearly always be improved. The nature of democratic relationships usually depends on the education of the ^{people}, because this determines differences in freedoms and friendly communications between democratic countries. Democracies can be made more responsible to all people, so they create more friendly freedoms. Also, responsible governments of the people can be made less influenced by businesses that contribute enormously to their election campaigns. People that are better trained can become more economically cooperative with other people who are also well informed and have good understanding. Trade barriers between countries might be largely eliminated, so world nations could do a better job of working together in a friendly way. The wonderful contribution that democracies might make to world peace is their ability to become friendly with nations of other classes who develop favorable international relations. Soon, democracy that is great at negotiations may become a powerful support for peace Considerably warmer feelings are needed in dictatorships to make the world safe from war conflicts. This hazard is severe partly because dictatorships exercise their authority with their military strength and further because most dictatorships do not have very good personal relationships with other countries that have dictators or with democracies that have strong prejudices against dictatorships. Fortunately a number of dictatorships seem to build somewhat friendly relationships with some democracies by establishing better friendly communication with them about human rights. In the converting dictatorships people with warm feelings obtain a desire for freedom in their activities, which is slightly recognized by their autocratic authorities. There is some indication that improved dictatorships will make progress toward highly desirable international trade. Also, these governments may become slightly concerned about earths environmental problems, which must concern all countries. Then, as their international relations get warmer dictatorships may limit their military operations and move in the direction of democracy.

Whatever their forms of government a number of countries are strongly populated by people with a religion that is prejudiced against members of other religions as well as irreligious people, so they have their dominating authority. The feelings of these special religious countries are largely regarded as sacred and their people are veiwed as the only ones that are pure. So, their discriminating friendliness has difficulty establishing pleasant relationships between these countries and their religious enemies or uncompromising democracies. Having this serious difficulty to overcome, association and valuable communication with opposers frequently reveal the need of world peace for an increase in the warm feelings of religious countries. Cooperation in common environmental problems and the need for more economic trade may inject more warmth into their feelings. The international relations of religious countries seems to be improving too slowly, but some friendly hope for the future is developing.

Some countries are largely controlled by citizens of one majority race and members of other races are given only insignificant political power. This discrimination is continued by giving the preferred race the advanced education and training that is deferred from minorities. Then, nations having racial preference frequently develop poor cooperation with other nations that do not have this preference. Any well coordinated group of people who work for human rights with warm feelings should struggle to eliminate this racial discrimination. Training members of minority races have been known to contribute to the advancement. So, all races deserve equal recognition and should be given adequate opportunities to join the high technology section of society. With enough warm feelings all races might become willing ~~and able~~ to accept other races as equal members of their countries.

Peaceful international relations calls for more warm feelings in all countries of divergent classes. Remarkable and interesting experiments for people with sufficient warm feelings would be to establish a quality world wide educational system that would approve the presence of different religions, would recognize the existence of different races, would adopt a world language and would emphasize the need for warm feelings that would create cooperation.

Development Of World Peace Is Benefited By Accurate Communications Reports

Friendly international relations are quite dependent on the extent and accuracy of news reporting around the world. Peaceful people need to learn internationally and correctly about human rights, strength of warm emotions and preparation for wars by studying detailed news from other countries. This necessity makes all countries obligated to require their newspapers, TVs, Radios and other news media to install trustworthy reporters in most other countries, so world people have the possibility of becoming well informed about the ambitions and emotional feelings of all inhabitants of the earth for whom they want to develop warm feelings. The information may be positive or negative, so accurate international communication becomes a valuable contributing force for stimulating improved peacefulness around the world. When the messages are relatively warm, the friendly communications may go far toward eliminating the discrimination of people in one race by people of another race, the separation of people in one religion from people of another religion and the parting of people with one political doctrine from people of another government policy condition. The revaluation of the differences in the conditions of world inhabitants and the possible acceptance of the differences by international news media makes a valuable contribution to world peace.

The international communications that are particularly important for peace are the reports about the preparations of each nation for participating in world military action. Some dictators have a tendency to engage in wars and they might get overly armed because manufacturing facilities are in operation for producing the most powerful military weapons that the producers want to sell. Thus, when reports disclose that a nation is preparing excessively for the next war by developing its military strength, peaceful nations should make strong efforts to persuade this military nation to desist its military preparation or design its arms as an international police force for peace. Also, military nations should be informed of all the warm feelings they would obtain by devoting most of this arming money and efforts on important social services. This friendly type of communication between countries might go far to improve international relations until eventually world peace would arrive.

A peaceful world economic structure calls for detailed international communication by reporters that deals with business rights and consumer necessities for the people in different world countries, because some nations are rich and others are poor. If the special reports from some countries reveal any refusal they make for international trade and any poor contribution they make to world prosperity, a challenge might emerge to introduce them more cooperatively into world economics by having conferences. A lasting world peace has definite requirement for friendly international trade, which supplies nations with products that they do not manufacture or produce at reasonable exchange rates. Warm feelings between nations that have similar economic operations can be made warmer when the common materials that are put on the world market have competitive prices with minor subsidies. News reporting of the fairness in cooperative international economics can help develop world peace.

Communications of countries when reporting their important news and acquiring international information are most reliable in democracies, although this cooperation in reporting can usually be improved. People in democracies that have wide spread warm feelings become relatively anxious to learn accurate information about what is going on in the world. People in dictatorial countries seldom want any new information besides the orders that they get from their governments. So, news about the nature of various national governments and their political activities is valuable to help all people work toward making their countries more democratic, which would improve the possibility of world peace. The indications are getting more positive that nations with highly warm feeling governments will not develop any wars with each other.

The democratic countries with warm feelings have special public problems related to their right to know valuable information. Newspapers, magazines, TVs, radios and other media are largely made public by commercial companies who must make a profit. So, the free press requires a measure of supervision to insure the accuracy of their reporting, particularly to eliminate any discrimination in the news. Fortunately, the competition between all of the different sources of current information makes the reports more accurate and more available in democratic countries. The current news usually plays a decisive role in determining their national and international policies, which makes democracies valuable proponents of world peace.

Warm feelings are dependent on friendly human contacts, so world peace is benefited by good communications between individuals who live in many countries that have a majority of residence with a special background, race, or religion. To build up friendly reliable communications between different nations world travel of many more people would be important. Then the well traveled inhabitants back in the places where the travelers live could associate more and talk more with any variety of people that they encounter in their neighborhoods. Unfortunately in most communities around the world people like to live in neighborhoods where their neighbors have the same social status. In general many people feel more able to communicate with others who have the same family background, race and religion, which creates a world situation that is a great challenge for communication to develop friendly international relations that are quite important for world peace.

The challenge for friendly contacts around the world might be met by the personal practices of concerned peaceful individuals. They should recognize, mentally and emotionally, their need for warm feelings as a valuable personal talent and be proud of their special skills. Then, the peace makers must stress the importance of friendliness and cooperation in their many activities. As their strong efforts to search for love of people increases, they must understand the value of humor, study and acomodation as means for overcoming individual differences and bad feelings.

The United Nations Can help Spread Warm Feelings For World Peace

The United Nations offers the world many opportunities to spread some warm feelings between nations. Its principle friendly activities over forty five years have been peace supporting, disarmament, promotion of human rights and welfare of children. In addition, UN has helped poorer countries with their monetary problems, their use of land for agriculture, their education, their science and their various divergences. The friendly assistance that UN has given troubled nations has been quite enjoyable, But, the number of serious problems that afflict the countries of the world are enormous and the UN has limited power and resources to apply for obtaining solutions. Still, the UN has shown enough peaceful success in its activities to justify the world increasing these UN remedies for difficulties that are employed with such effective warm feelings. Records suggest that the world is greatly in need of more UN successes.

If the United Nations was much stronger and if its actions used still warmer feelings, its operations for world peace might become magnificent. The world needs an international authority that would be effective in preventing the development of violent conflicts which would become wars. With this UN advancement, concerned people who were threatened by a war might communicate with the improved Security Council, which authority would send an experienced negotiation team to attempt the development of a peaceful situation and possibly would send a preventive military force to the conflicting area. The activities of this stronger world authority would concentrate on reconciling world nations, so with sufficient warm feelings they would settle all world discords without wars.

A very important function of the more effective United Nations would be to keep improving the friendly relationships of world nations, and isolated groups, by exercising their warm feelings. These efforts would involve the encouragement of several worldwide communication systems that would include news papers, TV and radio media. The expanded communication would create increased people understanding people by partially overcoming language difficulties and by injecting various histories, cultures and politics into the process. In addition, the UN would promote the world travel that would build considerable friendly contacts between different countries. Music and art programs would be given opportunities to tour the world to improve relationships. International athletic events would help the UN develop a measure of emotional unity in the world. Eventually, the nations of the world would feel this character of being in cohesion.

The peace keeping ability of a strong United Nations would necessacarily be demonstrated by its expertness in preventing wars by strategically initiating strategic sanctions against nations that would threaten to develop violence. The strategy of these proventive actions might be relatively simple and effective against a democratic country, but because of their difficulty these actions would need to be applied early to a dictatorship and would require lessening the authority of the leader. Still, the controversies would be negotiated peacefully by the UN when disputes between nations became obvious. Peaceful agreements about an international querral would be settled by the action of the Security Council, so most countries would not get involved except in the sanctions.

If the more powerful United Nations with warmer feelings was made aware of any abandonment of an international agreement to limit the amount of military arms that were available for war, the Security Council might demand a decrease in this aggressive build-up of these armaments. The UN reconciling activities might spend much of its efforts in helping nations in the disposal of their unaccepted armaments. Nuclear bombs might well be turned into peace time energy sources; armed tanks might be reconstructed into transportation trucks; fighter airplanes might be used in experiments to make passenger airplanes safer. Then, strong efforts might be made to transfer scientific research from its activities of developing powerful weapons to the important means for preserving the environment. Warm feelings could be made warmer more easily, if the world had fewer deadly arms.

The more aggressive United Nations of the future might take a more active role in promoting human rights to stabilize world peace. When its attention was called to the existence of discrimination among diverse people, it might make a strong effort to peacefully reconcile people with cultural or physical differences. Eventually the world might be full of various people with life, liberty and pursuit of achievements, who are doing a an increasingly good job of cooperation. More activities of the Security Council might be focused fairly on the rights of poorly developed countries to have expanding economic and social progress. The world might become loaded with opportunities for people with warm feelings. In particular, the world might be a more just place for its inhabitants and all of them might be treated fairly equally in a friendly way.

A really effective international authority would provide a high level of worldwide training of children and welfare supervision. The children of today will become the adults of the future and the world will become a better place to live peacefully, if the present children in all countries are given much important friendly treatment and are able to learn the wonders of warm friendly feelings in their lives. Possibly the Secretary General could increase his study of child abuse and could supervise the expansion of parent training to provide much better services that would improve the care of children who are suffering from malnutrition, diseases or illiteracy. Rather an astonishing number of children die each year from preventable causes. Also, a greater number survive to become disadvantaged members of society. The world might receive remarkable peaceful benefits, if the UN could increase its services of child welfare until many social problems of the future could be solved in a friendly manner with warm feelings.

An additional important function of an advanced UN authority would be to promote the expansion of growing-up peoples education, especially in the realm of science, environment and good health and definitely with warm feelings. More people need to know enough about the rules of the Universe, so they can understand something about what worldwide action is developing and might do a better job of participating. The better scientifically educated members of society might be able to help keep the modern technology in good working condition. With warmer feelings more people might understand better the data that are made available by scientists and be able to hold down better jobs helping people. Then, the better educated people who realize the problems that the environment faces might make possible the preservation of good living conditions on earth's surface. Hopefully, the information that people would get in the progressive training system would enable them to live longer with better health. Better informed and understanding people may improve most human relationships with their warm feelings.

Naturally a very valuable educational activity of a world authority would be to require nations to provide more special training facilities for producing excellent teachers. Now the need for more highly educated members of all societies is becoming fairly well recognized. But, high quality education does require high quality of the materials and the feelings in the classroom. Therefore all nations should respond by improving many more of their teachers' abilities to give their students satisfactory instruction. Definitely nations should train more high quality teachers, so class room size can be decreased and more comprehensive subjects could be injected into the student learning process with warm feelings.

The wonderful activity of a future United Nations would be to pressure world nations to preserve the environment by decreasing contamination through improved transportation, agriculture and waste recycling. Present human beings must be supervised by UN with warm feelings in the conservation of earth's contents and surroundings. Their descendants may be very thankful, if earth retains its environmental necessities of uncontaminated air, water and land. The air around the earth must be kept in good condition by people maintaining a large number of trees and plants to keep the oxygen concentration at a good level. Also, the radiation on earth must be made safe by retaining the upper ozone layer through the decreasing of chloroflurocarbons that are discharged. Then, earths water must be maintained relatively pure by preventing the discharge of toxic wastes in rivers, lakes and oceans. Possibly there should be a decreasing amount of water osed per person. In addition, land must be preserved for use in agriculture, forests and gardening by purifying irrigation water, ,which may call for cecycling most of the materials used by society, such as paper. Earths environment needs effective cooperative remedial action by the UN, which would be a great move toward world peace.

With more responsibility the United Nations might bring pressure on all countries to decrease their national debts to make their economies more stable, even if they used the World Bank in the process. At the present time a substantial number of nations have various economic problems that are somewhat disruptive of their prosperity. The one difficulty that is far reaching involves the yearly national budget deficit, because these deficits increase the national debt. So, for world peace the expenditures of many country governments must be decreased or taxes must be increased otherwise the national debt simply increases. Thus, a special task of the responsible UN would be to require many nations to spend less money on the military build-up and obtain more taxes from citizens with plenty income money. Adversely governments decreasing their expenditures for the military would create unemployment, as also the decreasing the amount of money they spend on social programs would be fairly disastrous. In addition, taxes have been given a burdensome reputation in the citizens of some countries. So, effective effective UN action on government deficits must be very strategic. Attempts might be made to have governments decrease their expenditures without increasing unemployment by directing their activities toward preserving the environment and enlisting the monetary help of private agencies. With some special efforts income tax payments might be made larger and fairer for concerned high income citizens, because their taxable incomes might be somewhat decreased by donations to their charitable organizations. In addition personal incomes might be decreased further by investments in new industries that employ more people. Then, with various strategic sales taxes, some governments might increase their incomes appreciably in the cause of world peace.

A peaceful world might benefit from a special delegated committee in the United Nations that would report yearly on the various peace time conditions in all of world's areas that might either positively generate peace or negatively produce hostilities. The purpose of the report would be to activate the Secretary General to take any remedial action that might prevent the development of wars by spreading the growth of warm feelings and expanding the extension of world cooperation. The committee members would be selected from the UN members who represented countries in the different geographic areas of the world. So, the number of committee members might be three from North America, two from South America, two from Africa, two from Europe, two from the Eastern Mediterranean area, three from Asia and two from the Pacific Islands. These members would contribute to the committee report individually, as area opinions and collectively. The subjects reported that would be given the greatest peace time consideration would include area peoples warmth of feelings, people understanding people, national economic stability, control of military build up, decrease in cultural and religious aversion and increase in the degree of democracy. Discoveries that would need to be regarded as dangerous for world peace would be that several nations kept building up smart weapons, deadly missiles, stinger helicopters and other high technology arms. Preventive war measures seemed to rely strongly on building up friendly international relationships. So, the UN committee recommendations would need to concentrate on improving the education of all people until all of the important peace time conditions would be spread out over the world.

The committee members that would be representative of the seven world areas would meet regularly, in the city where the UN meets, and would gather together their discoveries about international peacefulness quite carefully. In each meeting of the UN the committee would present their recommendations for actions that might improve world peace by preventive measures. Then, the Security Council would assume the responsibility for accepting the recommendations and would attempt to carry out most of the measures, knowing that it had special world approval. With a more devoted UN the world might keep adopting more effective measures that would enable warm feelings to bring it closer to a wonderful state of universal peace.

Quality of World Peace Is Influenced by Local Organizations.

The remarkable organizations that attract most loving people and challenge them to create an outstanding world peace are numerous. In the peaceful action are organizations that struggle to increase international understanding; organizations that work strongly for human rights; organizations that oppose world preparation for another war; organizations that work on world economic problems quite carefully; organizations that promote more international trade; organizations that labor to improve education in all world countries; organizations that struggle to expand and improve democracies; organizations that strive continuously to preserve worlds environment; organizations that try to make transportation in the world safer. Around the world the build up of local organization action to promote better relationships between countries is making important progress.

The value of local peace organizations around the world is based largely on their ability to spread their warm feelings that are focused on world harmony. Also, the process of building a local peace group increases the special advertising of the need for very good international relations. Then, as understanding the value of world peace is given more publicity in more communities, the means for avoiding wars become more popular. Hopefully, as a result of action by peace organizations more local money would be spent for improving human friendliness and less money would be directed toward the government preparation for the next war. So, the local organizations around the world will need a larger number of people with warm feelings who will participate eagerly in peace action.

Eventually the high quality of world peace will be created by organizations of people with so many varieties of warm feelings that relationships will be astonishingly beneficial. The list of highly loving people will include people loving people; people helping people who need help; people helping to correct social errors; people taking care of themselves quite well; people trusting others quite carefully; people understanding the universe substantially; people being ambitious to work in the economy effectively; people who are very cooperative; people who enjoy working on serious problems; people who are determined to make important accomplishments; people who are determined to help produce effective local governments; people who are resolute in electing progressive state governments; people who are determined to participate in electing peaceful national governments; people who are aggressive in supporting a peaceful world authority like the United Nations.

Life Time Human Problems Call Strongly For World Peace

With their many emotional problems people of all ages might be converted to work together for world peace as they expand their warm feelings that give them special satisfactions. In all countries the inhabitants at each age have enormous needs for help from people of other ages to develop the maximum strength of their warm feelings that are valuable for developing world peace. People of all ages who receive this emotional relief from friendly concerned folks of a different age may be able to live much more peacefully. So, the warm assistance that is given people with emotional problems is so rewarding enough for society to produce many social services that provide improvements for serious emotional situations. These difficulties may continue to distress some societies and will always call for expanded friendly remedies to create world peace.

Developing the emotional start of children toward warm feelings requires their very early exposure as babies to the wonderful friendliness of parental love. Thus world peace has a desperate need for early parental love increase in all of the homes in all of the nations. Some children problems may start before birth as a result of pregnant mothers indulging drugs, tobacco or alcohol. and abuse may continue after children are born, when emotions and health care are not given careful attention. But, parental warm feelings seem to be essential to instill important love into the youngest children, so they do not make undesirable misuse of their emotions. All kinds of displeasures of babies should be directed toward forgiveness or amusement instead of violence. Fortunately, the acquainted people in the mature age group, who have very warm feelings, can furnish baby children with important loving emotions. Then, the love of the children starts them learning many kinds of desirable emotional, mental and physical methods of overcoming any disturbances.

The special requirement for babies to learn warm feelings continues with their growth because otherwise the serious problem that they may encounter is neglect. Evidence indicates that these youngest human beings respond favorably to many contacts from adults, especially mothers and fathers. Necessary attention, careful touching and warm handling can be given babies by many friendly actions, including washing, drying and putting on their clothes. Particularly the warm hugging by adults has a good stimulating effect on the youngest children by giving them more love in their early emotions. Children tend to copy the tender emotions that are expressed by the close attentive parents. Their warm feelings are very valuable assets for the early arrivals who respond warmly to a great deal of friendly attention.that can prepare them for a peaceful world.

Disadvantaged conditions in young children as they get older should stimulate important assistance from highly concerned adults who discover the difficulties. Handicapped youngsters have different types of problems that decrease their contributions to society without help from adults with special warm feelings. Some children have a tendency to display the emotional problem of hatred as a response to ordinary treatment, which calls for special training.

Other handicapped youngsters require mechanical devices to enable them to perform well physically. Their limbs may not function normally and would respond better with exercise mechanical treatment. Eye sight may need to be improved, so the baby could see well, which is usually accomplished by providing eye grasses. Considerable warm feelings are essential for parents to determine that their children have handicapps and then to provide remedies that would almost eliminate the disadvantaged conditions. Preserving the cure of handicapped can produce an astonishing amount of warm feelings for the protective action.

World peace may be specially dependent on the loving solutions of problems that youths encounter as they approach maturity and finally reach adult age. Certainly these young people must avoid joining gangs that indulge in violence. Still, their emotional development is complicated by the arousal of their sexual desires. Males and semales should grow-up with a certain amount of warm feelings for all friendly people. But, with the evolution of sexual desires male and female couples who decide to get married must develop a two-way love that is wonderfully uniting. In addition, the important combination of mental and emotional problems that maturing individuals must make is the determination to acquire good advanced education, even though it costs a lot of money. School subjects researched may concentrate on the special mental interests of the maturing individual. But, the emotional requirements of students must be given important consideration, so, each well educated person develops a high level of warm feelings. Then, after graduation the early adult must make a strong effort to find employment in an occupation that is working definitely for world peace.

World peace welcomes to an international extent the mature adults who have developed the maximum friendliness with their warm feelings during their growing-up life times. Unfortunate emotions and passionate actions that would be overcome by their warm feelings type of training during their early years would make loving adults very valuable members of all world societies. Their good cooperation would conquer inertia that might involve jealous opposition; their increased understanding of other people would defeat most of the human discords arising from lack of contacts; their trust in established information about people would master some of the obstructive nature of those who are ignorant; their being quite harmonious in groups would help the group suppress antagonistic members that retard action; their offering wide companionship would surmount violent rivalry found in gangs; their friendly forgiveness of outrage would defeat any feelings of revenge; their wide feelings of human unity would vanquish practically all international hostilities; their warm friendliness would eliminate most international enmity; their kindly actions would help the world avoid most conflicts. As a special by-product of warm feelings in a nation these emotions would create a high degree of individual freedoms under a democratic government with dedication to liberty as prescribed by just loving laws, which would win the internal national conflicts over harsh restrictions of peoples actions under dictatorial governments as well as racial or religious authorities.

Making the world a safer place for all people is a challenge for those with warm feelings to eliminate considerable violence and lessen some provocations. Just cutting down on the number of serious accidents by training and informing would decrease the bitter feelings of people who experience unfortunate injuries. Helping to repair the damage of earthquakes would greatly reward the repairers and would make those who suffer less misfortunes very friendly. Giving effective help to those who need help badly makes both giver and receiver more active in a peaceful world. In particular, the improvement in the education of learners of all ages, who are scarcely able to pay the costs, would build the enlightened emotional advancement in societies that need peace. Producing effective health care systems that would improve human vitality would make warmer emotional strength throughout the world. Providing jobs for more people who need to be employed in work that they like would be quite invigorating for all economies. Also, efforts to enlist most of people on earth to work on preserving the environment would create substantial unity of all nations.
